Abella appointed to the Supreme Court

Rosalie Abella

Ontario judge known for human rights, equity activism

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Anyone who has ever listened to Madam Justice Rosalie Abella – named last week to the Supreme Court of Canada – address a Jewish audience has heard the otherwise cheerful yet steely jurist choke up at the precise point that she mentions her father.

Jacob (Jack) Silberman was a brilliant young lawyer in his native Poland, having won a scholarship to study law at Jagiellonian University in Warsaw – one of four Jews permitted to attend under quotas. It was a long way from the shtetl of Sienno where he was born, and from Radom, where he went to high school.

But he was only able to practise law for one year. Nazi Germany invaded Poland on Sept. 1, 1939, just two days before Jack married his beloved Fanny. The invasion sparked a conflagration that would see the newlyweds dodge deportation until 1941 but then spend the next four years shunted to various labour and concentration camps, including Buchenwald.

Gold medal for Israel!

Gal Fridman, a 28-year-old windsurfer, is surrounded by well-wishers and supporters after winning Israel's first ever Olympic gold medal last week in Athens. "It's tremendous joy" Fridman said after the event. Please see related story on page 70. [Isranet photo]

New Israeli envoy arrives next week

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Alan Baker, the current legal adviser and deputy director-general of Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, replaces Haim Divon as the Israel's ambassador to Canada on Sept. 5.

From his office in Jerusalem a week before leaving for Ottawa, Baker said that Canada is a country that he has always felt close to. "So when the opportunity came up to become ambassador, I grasped it. I'm looking forward to the challenges of working with the Canadian government, the Canadian public and the Canadian Jewish community."

Although his new position marks a departure from his roles as senior legal officer in the international law branch of the Military Advocate General's Unit (1974-79), as legal adviser for the Foreign Ministry (since 1979), and as a negotiator for the peace treaties between Israel and Egypt, Jordan, Lebanon and the Palestinians, Baker said he is well positioned for the new post.

"The position in Canada will be a big change in direction. But I think one of the reasons that I was appointed is because of my experience in actually negotiating," he said. "I speak from a position where I can offer the most detailed reasoning and argumentation as to what lies behind Israel's various decisions."

News in Brief

CANADA

Fonz to Open Campaign

VANCOUVER — Actor and director Henry Winkler, who played the Fonz on the sitcom Happy Days, will be the keynote speaker at the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver's Combined Jewish Appeal campaign launch Sept. 8. Quoting Zionist leader Theodor Herzl, he told the Western Jewish Bulletin that he'll speak to the theme, "If you will it, it is not a dream," which he called "the cornerstone" of his life.

WORLD

Security Increased

PARIS — Paris Mayor Bertrand Delanoe said security will be increased at the city's Jewish institutions after the arson of a Jewish social centre last month. Delanoe said additional video cameras would be installed at buildings frequented by Jews and he will ask city council to increase security spending by a third to protect Jewish institutions. Security will also be improved at Jewish nurseries, schools, synagogues and old age homes, he said. In addition, a campaign to sensitize citizens to fight anti-Semitism, racism and discrimination will be launched this month.

Vandal Arrested

PARIS — French police arrested a man last Tuesday after seeing him draw a swastika and a Magen David on an Interior Ministry building. The man, described as of Romanian origin, also shouted, "Long live Germany," police said. Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom was to meet his French counterpart Dominique de Villepin that day at the ministry.

Just Hamas Tourists?

BALTIMORE — A Hamas operative was arrested last week after his wife videotaped the Chesapeake Bay Bridge in Maryland while the couple and their family were driving on it, authorities said. Ismael Selim Elbarasse was detained Aug. 20 by two off-duty police officers and held as a material witness in connection with a terror case in Chicago that charged another Hamas operative with laundering thousands of dollars to the terror group. Elbarasse – who said he was coming back from a trip to the beach, though no one in the car could say which beach when asked by police – was not charged in the videotaping incident.

Hate Hoax Conviction

LOS ANGELES —A psychology professor was convicted last month of perpetrating a hate crime hoax by vandalizing her own car with racist and anti-Semitic graffiti. Kerri Dunn, an assistant visiting professor at Claremont McKenna College, was found guilty of filing a false police report and attempted insurance fraud, which is punishable by up to 3½ years in jail. When the incident was first reported last March, the campus and Jewish communities staged sit-ins, forums and rallies in protest. Dunn said her car was vandalized after she gave a lecture on racism, but witnesses testified she vandalized it herself.

Controversial Memorial

TALLINN, Estonia — A controversial memorial has been dedicated to Estonian soldiers who fought alongside the German SS in World War II. The memorial, a statue of a soldier in a Nazi uniform, was unveiled Aug. 20 in the western region of Lihula before about 2,000 people. The inscription dedicates it "to the Estonians who fought against Bolshevism and for Estonian independence from 1940 to 1941." Regional Mayor Tiit Madisson said the statue was dedicated to people who chose the lesser of two evils. "They had experienced Soviet occupation and did not want to return to it," he said.

Day of Prayer for Israel

CHICAGO — The International Fellowship of Christians will hold its annual day of solidarity with Israel on Oct. 17, when churches will be asked to focus their services on Israel. Five million people took part last year, organizers said.

Lula Opposes Hate

BRASILIA — Brazilian president Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva has signed a petition against anti-Semitism and said Brazil would support such a resolution at the United Nations. He made the pledge at a meeting last month with a delegation led by World Jewish Congress president, Rabbi Israel Singer.

E-mail Scam Uses Holocaust Story

OMAHA — A new scam that uses the Holocaust to try to defraud unsuspecting responders arrived in e-mail in-boxes last month, the Omaha Jewish Press reported.

It came from a "Mr. George Graham" who falsely claims to be a member of Independent Committee of Eminent Persons (ICEP), a body with representatives from Swiss banks and the Jewish community established in 1996 to investigate dormant accounts and other assets of Nazi victims deposited in Swiss banks during or before World War II.

The e-mail states that "a dormant account of 'ORDNER ADELE' with a credit balance of 50,000,000 U.S. dollar plus accumulated interest was discovered by me. The beneficiary was murdered during the holocaust [sic] era, leaving no will and no possible records for trace of heirs."

The e-mail continues: "Being a member of ICEP, I have all secret details and necessary contacts for claim of the funds without any hitch. The funds will be banked in any country of your choice outside Switzerland or a tax free country, where we can safely withdraw the funds and… share the funds and use it for investment of our choice. Due to the sensitive nature of my job, I need a foreigner to help claim the funds."

It then asks for the recipient's name, bank account information and phone number for "further explanation."

The ICEP has released a warning about the scam, as has Arizona Attorney General Terry Goddard, who said it looked like a new version of a similar "advance fee" scam that originated in Nigeria. Goddard advised Arizonians to remember that, "If an offer sounds too good to be true – it is."

Legends mix with politics in Ethiopia

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

According to legend, the Queen of Sheba decided to visit the wise King Solomon in his holy city of Jerusalem in order to consult with him about issues of governance. She returned to her palace in Aksum, a little bit wiser and a little bit pregnant with King Solomon's child, whom she later named Dawit.

When Dawit grew older, he decided to visit his father in Jerusalem and learn the ways of the Israelites. As time went on, he grew restless for his home in Aksum, then one of the most powerful kingdoms in the ancient world, and left the Holy Land, absconding with the Ark of the Covenant among his possessions.

Since then, it is believed that the Ark was secreted away in various hiding places, until it came to rest in the old St. Mary of Zion Church sometime in the sixth century.

It is so common to relive old world legends in Ethiopia that it doesn't seem at all odd when Thomas, the local guide, knocks on the door at four in the morning and says it's time to see the Ark.

A tapestry in St. Mary of Zion Church depicts King Solomon, the Queen of Sheba and the Temple priests looking on as Dawit leaves Jerusalem for Ethiopia with the Ark and the priests' eldest sons. [Anna Morgan photo]

"The curtain is open," says the guide, who spends his days proudly showing off the tombs and temples of Aksum, an ancient city in the northern Ethiopian highlands, while stealthily steering the steady trickle of intrepid tourists away from the bat-filled caves that still conceal unopened artifacts.

And now, he indicates that it is time to join the worshippers, draped from head to foot in white, tallit-like shawls, as they make their way from the surrounding hills, trancelike, toward the rhythmic beating of a drum and the monotonous chanting of the priests that seem to get louder as we draw closer to the centre of town and the St. Mary of Zion Church or, more accurately, churches.

The new St. Mary of Zion Church, which is open to the public, stands next to the ancient St. Mary of Zion Church, where it is believed that the original Ark of the Covenant has been protected for centuries.

Besides the single monk entrusted with the care of the Ark, no one is allowed near. In fact, our Lonely Planet guidebook says that "many are the unfortunate onlookers who have 'burst into fire' just for getting close."

"Not to worry," Thomas promises. In a new church, behind red velvet drapes, lies an exact replica of the Ark of the Covenant, the original of which rests in the church next door. Replica

JEWISH NATIONAL FUND OF TORONTO
2004 Negev Dinner Honouree
RONALD APPLEBY Q.C.
in recognition of excellence in communal leadership and dedication to Israel
JNF JEWISH NATIONAL FUND OF CANADA
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 2004, 6:00 P.M. at the Sheraton Centre Hotel in Toronto

Jewish National Fund is proud to pay tribute to one of Toronto's outstanding community leaders at our 56th Annual Negev Dinner.

Ronnie Appleby's involvement with and contribution to the life of this community is nothing short of exceptional. Ronnie is widely respected in the Jewish community, within his profession, amongst a gamut of organizations and by all who know him.

Ronald Appleby Q.C. is a prominent lawyer, known for his wisdom, judgment and intellect. As well as being an active member of the legal profession, he holds a number of corporate directorships, has been published and has been involved with academic legal training. He is currently senior partner of the law firm Robins, Appleby & Taub.

In addition, Ronnie has played a leadership role in many major civic, philanthropic and cultural organizations. He has served as Chairman of the United Jewish Appeal, President of The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, President of the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University, Chairman of the Board of Overseers of the Jewish Theological Seminary; and has chaired major fundraising campaigns and dinners for Prostate Cancer Research at Princess Margaret Hospital and the Weizmann Institute, Mount Sinai Hospital, Jewish National Fund, Reena Foundation, the Hartman Institute, and the Asper Centre (at the) School Of Business of the Hebrew University.

He has served with distinction as a Board Member and as Honourary Legal Counsel to JNF Toronto and has chaired two previous Negev Dinners.

Ronnie was brought up to cherish his Judaism, tzedakah and Israel by his parents Moishe and Jennie Appleby. He and his wife Bunnie have passed those values on to their children Dawn and Todd, Corry and Neil, Kyle, Marni and four grandchildren. We all benefit from Ronnie's devotion and commitment to these ideals. Please join the Toronto community in recognizing an inspiring leader at this year's Negev Dinner.

Suspicious spy allegations

From the editor's desk

The allegations against a Pentagon official of spying on behalf of Israel that erupted in the press on the weekend struck like a cold knife into the heart.

What began as an obviously deliberate leak of a news story to a preferred, specific media outlet last Friday became a torrent of rumour, innuendo and aspersion coursing through all the media.

CBS broke the story.

The network reported that the FBI has been conducting an ongoing investigation into the behaviour of a Pentagon official, who it alleges had conveyed highly sensitive information said to be draft presidential directives on Iran to the Israeli government via two representatives of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), the highly celebrated lobby group on behalf of Israel based in Washington.

Charges were imminent, the CBS report said. Although, as of this writing, most officials are saying the probe would not likely become an espionage case but, rather, would result in lesser charges such as improper release of classified information or mishandling of government documents.

As other news agencies picked up the story, the person under investigation was identified as U.S. Air Force Reserve Col. Lawrence Franklin who worked with Douglas J. Feith, the undersecretary of defence for policy. Franklin had once served as an attaché in the U.S. embassy in Tel Aviv, which the stories made certain to disclose, thus confirming his "guilt" in the minds of the purveyors of the story.

Feith, it must be remembered, was responsible for a special U.S. intelligence unit before the start of the war in Iraq that searched for evidence of links between Saddam and Al Qaeda. The intelligence reporting of his unit has since been severely criticized.

Despite the fact that accusations against Franklin relate to disclosure of information concerning Iran, the CBS report also alleged – and here is the essential gravamen of the matter – that FBI investigators are concerned that Israel may have used the spy to try to influence U.S. policy on the war in Iraq.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's office categorically denied any Israeli espionage. "Israel has no connection to this matter," his office said. "The United States is Israel's greatest ally. Israel is not engaged in intelligence activities in the United States and denies reports to the contrary."

AIPAC, too, immediately issued a denial. "We would not condone or tolerate, for a second, any violation of U.S. law or interests. We are fully cooperating with the governmental authorities and will continue to do so."

Though no one had been charged, nothing had been proved and even though Israel and AIPAC have categorically denied the accusations against them as false, the harm to Franklin, the Jewish state and to the American lobby group has already been enormous.

The mere suggestion of an AIPAC-Israel espionage connection will confirm the vivid imaginings of the vocal anti-Israel, anti-Iraq war activists who have long charged that the military ouster of Saddam was the result of a sinister, neo-conservative (read Jewish) cabal of control over the White House.

We trust the truth of the matter will emerge quickly. But one cannot help but be troubled by both the fact of the leak and its curious timing merely days before the Republican party convention in New York.

Who would share such information with a major news network even before any charges were laid? Are charges even warranted? It seems so transparent an attempt to embarrass the White House, to influence the outcome of the elections, to harm Israel and to implant a wedge of distrust – at least for the short term, if not longer – between U.S. President George W. Bush and the government of Israel.

The allegations against AIPAC and the unsubtle innuendo against the administration's influential Jewish advisers (the neo-conservatives) also, of course, raise the age-old anti-Jewish canard of dual loyalty.

At a number of levels, these developments are very troubling. We must pay close attention to them. The consequences may be ominous.

Changes.

Barbara Balfour, our campus columnist in Calgary for these past two years has completed her studies. She thus, moves on from her regular monthly column with the paper.

Fortunately, she has agreed to become a stringer for The CJN, reporting on the news from Calgary.

Joining Joanna Grossman as a monthly campus columnist is Jessica Apter, a student at Simon Fraser University in Vancouver.

The monthly campus columnists have been a regular component of the paper for almost 10 years. Their campus voices are a vital part of the sometimes harmonic, sometimes cacophonic, but always widely diverse, inclusive community chorus that is reflected in The CJN.

We extend our gratitude and wish to convey our gratitude to Barbara even as we welcome Jessica to the pages of the paper.

HELP US ENSURE THAT THE FLAME OF REMEMBRANCE IS NEVER EXTINGUISHED

The Holocaust Memorial at Earl Bales Park in Toronto, was built by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem to immortalize the Six Million precious souls murdered by the Nazis and their collaborators.

Members of the Jewish community are urged to provide names of Holocaust Victims to be carved on the eight black granite Walls which surround the 40-ft bronze Monument.

Survivors of the Holocaust, who have since passed away, are memorialized on Walls in a separate section.

An historical timeline, chronicling the tragic events that transpired in Europe from 1933 to 1945, is etched on the back panels of the Walls.

This Memorial serves as a permanent symbol for future generations that the lessons of the past must never be forgotten.

Please remember the Six Million Jewish Martyrs by donating to our Yiskor Appeal.

A smorgasbord of Jewish interest films

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

This year's 29th annual Toronto International Film Festival, which runs from Sept. 9 to Sept. 18, features a smorgasbord of films from Israel and around the world with themes and characters of interest to Jewish viewers.

The celebrated Italian Jewish painter, Amedeo Modigliani, whose works will be exhibited at the Royal Ontario Museum in October, is the subject of Mick Davis' biopic, Modigliani, which will have its world premiere at the festival.

Andy Garcia stars as Modigliani, the tortured artist who battled drug addiction, and Elsa Zylberstein portrays Jeanne Hebuterne, his Catholic lover.

Unfolding in Paris just after the end of World War I, the film revolves around three themes: Modigliani's troubled childhood, his relationship with Hebuterne–which her bigoted partents opposed – and his volatile rivalry with Pablo Picasso (played by Omid Djalili).

Invoking lush period details and featuring Emmanuell Kadosh's sumptuous cinematography, Modigliani is charged with emotion.

Andy Garcia as Modigliani, the Jewish artist from Italy in Mick Davis's biopic of the same name.

Al Pacino plays the Jewish moneylender Shylock in The Merchant of Venice, based on William Shakespeare's classic play of religious intolerance, misunderstanding, hypocrisy and entrapment.

Directed by Michael Radford, the film stars Jeremy Irons as the Christian merchant Antonio and Lynn Collins as his love interest, Portia.

Israel is represented by two films – Walk on Water and Promised Land.

Walk on Water, directed by Eytan Fox and written by Gal Uchovsky, is about an experienced Mossad agent (Lior Ashkenazi) assigned to track down Pia and Axel Himmelman, the grandchildren of a Nazi war criminal still at large.

One (Caroline Peters) lives on a kibbutz and the other (Knut Berger) works with the children of immigrants in Berlin.

'A dream come true'

Apparently, it was not only the wafting breezes of the salty wind that propelled Gal Fridman to his gold medal last week as he steered and angled his craft between the swells and whitecaps of the sparkling blue ocean. "I felt like the whole country was watching me and pushing me from behind," the exuberant 28-year-old windsurfer enthused to a news conference after the final, victorious race.

Indeed all of Israel was watching him, as were countless others, Jews and non-Jews, from all around the world, urging the wind to bend his sail felicitously toward the shore.

At the end of the day, young Gal Fridman was the first Israeli ever to win a gold medal at the Olympics. And it was more than a grateful country that felt the spine-tingling chill of that historic moment. It was an entire fellowship of jubilant followers who understood the miracle, the courage and the goodness of the Jewish state's participation in the Games.

Mere moments after Fridman was awarded his gold medal, the video of the ceremony was being relayed through the far reaches of space and back to computer screens in every corner of the globe. The spontaneous singing of Hatikvah by the handfuls of Fridman's – and Israel's – supporters after the bestowing of the medal sent shivers up the spine. They sang for us all.

The happy, smiling athlete wearing the gold medalist's laurel wreath joyfully represented his country on the winners' podium. It is, as we know, a tiny country that fits head to toe between Toronto and Montreal, reviled within its own Middle Eastern neighbourhood and isolated within the halls of the United Nations and its constituent committees.

Herb Keinon, the veteran commentator at the Jerusalem Post, aptly expressed the poignancy of Fridman's victory. "At a time when Jews in France are afraid to walk out their doors displaying any sign of their Jewishness, when the Foreign Ministry tells Israelis going abroad not to wear T-shirts with Hebrew writing, there was something deeply moving about watching Fridman proudly wrap himself in an Israeli flag.

"What crossed my mind while watching the race… was how this achievement speaks volumes about this country's vast reserves of resiliency. Thirty-two years after the Munich massacre, the Israeli flag was raised at the Olympics in victory, not lowered to half-mast in mourning. Four years after the current war that has sapped so much time, energy and treasure, the country retains trappings of normality – and nothing is more normal than sporting events and a preoccupation with them – and that itself is a partial victory."

"It's a dream come true," Fridman told the news conference after the race.

Inevitably, though, we stir from our dreams. The exigencies of life "awaken" us. But the dream that came true for Fridman, in a certain sense, came true for us as well.

Kol hakavod, all honour, to Gal Fridman.

Where is everybody?

Norman Epstein (CJN, July 29, "Dr. Norman Epstein: Jewish hero," by Avrum Rosensweig) is one of those rare individuals who takes feelings, thoughts, and ideas and turns them into actionable strategies to help repair the world, to partake in the Jewish ideal of tikkun olam. What's more, his courage in stepping outside of his comfort zone brought more attention to the genocide in Sudan and inspired other Jews to act.

Epstein asks an appropriate question: "Where is everybody?"

I and others asked this question in November 2001, when the first rally against global terrorism was held following 9/11. We asked again in June 2002 and in June 2003, when Canadians marched against anti-Semitism following an unbelievable increase in anti-Semitic incidents.

Interestingly, the question didn't come up when 50,000 Canadians protested the recent closure of CHOI radio by the federal broadcast regulator. Could it have something to do with how Ontarians feel about justice and freedom compared to Quebecers?

Whatever the answer, it seems the majority of Ontario Jews can't be bothered to act or move out of their comfort zones.

One of these days, we may not have a choice. Then the question will be, "Is it too late?"

Rosalind Franklin finally being credited

I was both pleased and disappointed to read Lawrence Hart's column about the story behind the discovery of the structure of DNA (CJN, Aug. 19). I was pleased, because at long last the name of Rosalind Franklin has been publicly affiliated with this important discovery, and disappointed, because he omitted an aspect of the story that left a stain on the character of this great scientist.

In his popular book The Double Helix, read by millions, James Watson filled the public mind with the picture of a difficult scientist called "Rosy" whose appearance, personality and scientific acumen left much to be desired. He falsely accused her of rejecting the helical structure of DNA and failing to understand the meaning of her own results. But he was well aware that the Nobel Prize he shared with the late Francis Crick and Maurice Wilkins rested heavily on the foundation of Franklin's photos, data and calculations, and that they obtained them without her knowledge.

The truth is that Franklin was a brilliant scientist and X-ray crystallographer, having written numerous papers on the nature of viruses, coal and DNA, while Watson and Crick were model-builders who depended for experimental data entirely on the work of others like Franklin, whose enormous contributions they failed to acknowledge. Indeed, it is doubtful that they could have come up with their structure of DNA ahead of her without access to her work.

As to her character and personality, contrary to Watson's fictitious Rosy, the wonderful book by the late Anne Sayre, Rosalind Franklin and DNA, described Franklin in positive terms as a warm, generous and exciting person.

Sayre knew Franklin personally, and later, in preparation for her book, carried out in depth interviews with her colleagues, friends and family members. On the subject of Franklin's part in discovering the structure of DNA, Sayre's earlier thoughtful account was corroborated by that of Brenda Maddox, whom Hart cited.

Lynne Osman Elkin, a professor of biological sciences at California State University at Hayward, has proposed that the official name of the molecule should be "The Watson, Crick, and Franklin structure of DNA." Her article in Physics Today can be seen on the Internet at www.physicstoday.org/vol-56/iss-3/p42.html.

More sounds of silence

I read and agreed with the editorial on the shame perpetrated by those attending the Olympic opening ceremonies and the deafening silence from both the International Judo Federation and the International Olympic Committee regarding an Iranian judoka's refusal to compete against an Israeli. Perhaps it was a wise move on the Iranian's part, because if he had lost to the Israeli, he would likely have been stoned to death upon returning home.

I think we can safely say that more "sounds of silence," as your headline put it, are emanating from our government on the Olympic issue.

The world holds Israel to a higher moral standard, yet excuses terrorists and now poor sportsmanship, too. Can you imagine the hue and cry if the Israeli had refused to compete against the Iranian?

If our government bellied up to the bar and voiced support for Israel, "sounds of silence" would be an apt description for my comatose state.

Seeking Dilefsky

I am searching for any members of the Dilefsky family who lived on St. Cuthbert Street in Montreal in the 1910's.

As the result of a random purchase in an antique shop, I have researched the World War I military record of Morris Dilefsky, who died in Toronto on April 15, 1924. I would be happy to pass along the research to any surviving family members, if they're interested.

I can be e-mailed at trustsap@fiduciary-trust.com.

When we welcome Romania's president...remember

By BARUCH COHEN

Romanian President Ion Iliescu is to visit Montreal on Sept. 17, The Canadian Jewish News reported in its Montreal edition of June 17.

Those welcoming him should recall a few aspects of the history of Romanian anti-Semitism and the destruction of Romanian Jewry.

Romania must come to terms with its history of anti-Semitism in order to be accepted among the family of nations.

According to Shvut: Jewish Problems in Eastern Europe (Diaspora Research Institute), the Union of Land Jews wrote in a manifesto to the Romanian parliament that "Romanian nationalism views us as a foreign element that prevents the Romanians from forming a purely Romanian middle class and concentrates in its hands huge sources of fortune. It believes that we are too numerous and don't leave enough room for the natural element to flourish in every domain of the economy and culture.

"A deadly war is being waged against us. They sow hatred against us... in towns, boroughs, villages... they openly incite violence against us."

This indictment, with its revelation of deep hostility toward Jews, was not made in December 1937, on the eve of the formation of the Goga-Cuza government, the second anti-Semitic government in Europe. The manifesto was sent to the Romanian parliament in February 1910, as a protest against the official anti-semitic policies of all Romanian governments from 1864 onward.

Anti-Semitic movements in Romania, as in other Christian countries, did not create the negative image of the Jew. It stems from church traditions and folk literature influenced by the church. In Romania, it emerged even though religiously based anti-Jewish persecution, such as the Inquisition, was virtually unknown, unlike other European – particularly Catholic – countries.

Another major contribution to the creation of the stereotype of the Romanian Jew came from the younger generation of intellectuals and the ideological currents prevalent in the last half of the 19th century.

The poet Mihail Eminescu (1850-1889) often used offensive descriptions of Jews and their traditions to justify rejection of any formula that might have granted any rights to Jews. "A nation gaining rights with no sacrifices and effort is the Jewish one... " he wrote. "The Jew disregards any work, exploits the local population, is a symptom of social disease... The Jews turned European journalism into what they have turned our alcoholic beverages – poison."

Many Romanian men of letters or representatives of the Romanian Orthodox clergy contributed to the creation of a negative image of Jews.

By the beginning of his rule in November 1940, war criminal and pro-Nazi Romanian leader Ion Antonescu had elaborated his policies toward Jews from what he had learned about Jews in school, in the army, from literature and from the Christian religion.

Greater Romania (PRM) party and extreme nationalist leader Corneliu Vadim Tudor gestures in front of the statue of the slain Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, in Brasov (185km north of Bucharest) January 15, 2004. Tudor unveiled the statue despite an outcry from Israel and Rabin's family, who said the man who denies the Holocaust took place in Romania, was exploiting Rabin's memory to further his political career. Tudor said the statue was a testament to his change of heart. [RNS/Reuters photo]

"The Yids are guilty of most of the misfortunes of this country," he said.

A year later, in July 1941, Antonescu declared, "You should be merciless... I do not know when, after how many centuries, the Romanian nation will enjoy again this total freedom of action, with the possibility for ethnic purification. This is the hour when we are masters on our territory. Let us use it! I do not mind if the world judges us as barbarians. The Roman Empire carried out a series of barbaric acts against its contemporaries and it was nevertheless the gratest [sic] political institution.

"If need be, shoot with the machine guns, and I say there is no law. We shall draft special laws, but don't give up in any way thinking that the legal provisions could be introduced today and that we could be the first to infringe them tomorrow. Therefore, without any formalities and in full freedom, I take the whole responsibility and I declare, there is no law."

More than 60 years later, anti-Semitism is alive and well in Romania. It is present among old Iron Guardists and among the revived extreme right in post-dictator Nicolae Ceausescu, contemporary Romania. President Iliescu is a former member of the Ceausescu apparatus.

In Romania, there is an old saying that anti-Semitism there starts with sucking milk at the mother's breast. Anti-Semitism remains an essential and integral component of the political and socio-economic plans and platforms of the extreme right and its supporters and members.

Contemporary anti-Semitism is a peril for Romania's democrats. There is an urgent need for instituting a curriculum about the history of anti-Semitism and racial discrimination in Romania at all levels of the school system.

Today, Romanian television shows the green-shirted Iron Guard in a favourable light, and the press praises the Iron Guard and the teachings of its leader, Cornelin Zelec Codreanu, while there are no textbooks that include the history of Romanian anti-Semitism.

It should be noted that recently the Associated Press reported from Bucharest that "Romania denies [the] wartime massacre of Jews" and "firmly claim[s] that within the borders of Romania between 1940 and 1945, there was no Holocaust."

Yet, as Emil Dorian wrote of the January 1941, Bucharest "Kristallnacht" in The Quality of Witness: A Romanian Diary 1937-1944: "What happened in Vacaresti, Dudesti and the surrounding neighbourhoods is indescribable... "

"The madness of destruction and crime descended on the homes in the ghettos as well. A synagogue burned down. Another one. The majestic Sephardic synagogue has been completely destroyed... "

"More corpses at Baneasa. The list of beaten and tortured people is endless, and crimes cover the complete range of demented imagination: Jews forced to drink gasoline with Epsom salts – crosses cut on the skin of their backs – torture and killing, on and on... "

Another account of the Romanian Holocaust can be found in Adrian Cernea's The Yassi Pogrom: A Witness Testimony.

"The Yassi pogrom [June and July 1941] was not a one-day spontaneous eruption but a continuous preparation campaign for the last 20 years of anti-Semitic indoctrination.

"The Yassi death trains, a precise execution of mass murder, using trains as weapons, hermetically closed, proved the crude, cruel intention, inhuman, diabolic intention to kill.

"The Yassi massacre must be considered the first act in the history of the Holocaust [in Romania]."

And let us not forget the death marches toward the Transnistria killing fields. More than 300,000 Jewish women, men and children were barbarically murdered. About half of Romania's prewar Jewish population of 800,000 died during the war.

Emil Constantinescu, president of Romania from 1996 to 2000, made numerous promises to implement the teaching of the history of the Holocaust, but did not follow through.

Finally, there is reportedly some progress at the University Napoca-Cluj, where a couple of lectures on the Holocaust are being offered.

The Romanian ambassador, in Ottawa, said that "Romania started late, but I'm sure we can catch up from behind," speaking about Romania's official recognition of its role in the Holocaust, as well as the inclusion of the Holocaust as a subject in Romanian textbooks. (The CJN, June 17)

However, it remains to be seen if the western world should accept and believe this promise. Only when the promise is realized will we believe it.

In order for Romania to be accepted into the European Union – expected by 2007 – and into NATO, it must prove to the world its sincere intention to totally expunge the venom of anti-Semitism, and begin officially and effectively teaching the history of the Holocaust in Romania's schools and universities.

Don't blame Israel for anti-Semitism

I am returning to the theme of my previous column – contemporary anti-Semitism – to suggest that practising Jews are less likely to be demoralized by it than those on the margin of Jewish life. Religious groups rarely put anti-Semitism at the top of their agendas, even though they and their institutions are usually the first to be attacked. Faith and lifestyle, not enemies, determine their Jewish identity.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

It is different with assimilated Jews. They seem to be preoccupied with anti-Semitism because they surmise that the more it is in the open, the less likely will they be accepted by gentiles. As David Mamet (whom I cited last time) put it, assimilated Jews "are like the office assistant raised to executive status who immediately forgets how to use the fax machine."

Hence their ambiguity toward Israel. On the one hand, the Jewish state has demonstrated that Jews can be like other nations. This has strengthened the hand of those seeking approval from non-Jews. On the other hand, much of contemporary anti-Semitism manifests itself as hostility to Israel. Thus, there are Jews today who have been duped by the contention that, had there been no Israel, there would be no anti-Semitism.

This is a preposterous idea. Had there been no Israel, all Jews would have become potential victims of persecution, as was the case in the Holocaust, not just targets of prejudice, as is the case now. Hitler would have had the posthumous victory that the late Emil Fackenheim warned against.

In her latest book, After Such Knowledge, Eva Hoffman writes: "People associated with other nations whose political behaviour we deem objectionable are not routinely attacked abroad because they belong to the same national group as those countries' governments." Those who attack us in this way now use an expedient excuse for hating Jews.

Jews must inoculate themselves against such poison. For to collude with the argument that implicates Israel in anti-Semitism is to exonerate the perpetrators. It is to be blind to the truth that our enemies will only be satisfied if we disappear from the face of the earth, not by assimilation but by extermination. Israel makes sure that will not happen: Never again!

There are overwhelming reasons why Jews should play a full part in the cultural and political life of the countries they live in. But integration is very different from assimilation. There is also much justification for being critical of policies of this or any other Israeli government. However, neither the legitimate claim to our rights as citizens here nor the legitimate right to express our views about politics there can obscure the stark truth about anti-Semitism or question the centrality of Israel in Jewish life.

Far from home, but closer to Judaism

When I first moved from Toronto to Burnaby, B.C., two years ago to attend Simon Fraser University, my winter jacket wasn't the only thing I left behind. Home held the comforts of family and friends, and a routine developed over 13 years of attending Jewish day schools and summer camps. And, like two years ago, this school year means seven more months of eating grocery store bagels.

Jessica Apter in Vancouver

I knew of only a handful of other Jewish students in all of SFU's residences, and the demands of school and learning my way around a new city kept me from making the 1½-hour trek to the nearest Hillel House at the University of British Columbia until my second semester. But most jarring for a Thornhillnik like me was that for the first time in my life, many of the people around me had never met a Jew before.

Having been so immersed in a vibrant Jewish community my entire life, I had never consciously felt the need to contemplate what being Jewish really meant to me. I was able to feel Jewish despite living a very secular life. Ironically, it took the religious isolation of living on a mountain in suburban Vancouver to finally push me to truly value my religion and embark on the personal journey of discovering what Judaism means to me and what role I could play in the Jewish community.

Bar and bat mitzvahs aside, I had never been to synagogue in my entire life, so I was more interested in making new friends and exploring my newfound independence than finding High Holy Day services to attend. When the cute boy in front of me in line for drinks at the campus pub recognized the Magen David on my necklace and invited me for dinner and services the next week with his family, it had been the furthest thing from my mind. But I accepted, despite a lack of confidence about my place in the shul scene.

Although I had made new best friends of varying ethnic, religious, and national backgrounds, there was something very special about the connection I made with another Jewish student. His family's hospitality taught me that I would have a home to celebrate in whenever I was near a Jewish community. Of course, my grandparents were thrilled to hear that I had met a nice Jewish boy, even one in faraway Vancouver.

The experience only made me want to explore more, and the curiosity of my friends in residence made me realize not only how little I knew, but also how much I had to share. When I gave up being vegetarian after nine years and decided I would try to keep kosher, I found I couldn't always answer my friends' questions about why I couldn't mix milk and meat, or eat bacon. The interest of those around me always amazed me and forced me to question things that I had simply taken for granted at home and made me want to learn even more. And so I turned to the Vancouver Hillel Foundation for Jewish Campus Life for answers.

As winter break rolled around, people began to ask me why Jewish kids got eight days of "Christmas presents" instead of just one. So I invited my floormates to light Chanukah candles with me in our common room. Although I had celebrated Chanukah as a child, the novelty of the experience for my Australian, Irish Catholic and Egyptian Muslim friends and the sincerity of their interest made the holiday that much more special.

These moments, among many more, brought me closer to my Judaism. Diversity of experience and the novelty of surroundings shouldn't be a cause for fear of isolation or assimilation. Rather, stepping away from the comforts of my community has meant, and will continue to mean, challenging myself to find my own place, both at my school in a new city, and within my own religion and traditions.

Breaking through Israel's prickly surface

Fresh off the plane from Tel Aviv, I find it hard to believe that summer has come to an end. Thoughts of falafel and the beach are giving way to school and "the real world."

As I begin my final year of undergraduate life, my attention is quickly focusing on graduate school applications and the all-important decisions that await me after I graduate.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

Since I would rather reminisce about a summer in Israel than contemplate the decisions that lie ahead in the coming year, I have chosen to write about the former rather than the latter this month.

The day of my departure, as I sat on the beach in Tel Aviv, my thoughts turned to Israel and the many paradoxes of Israeli life.

Native Israelis are nicknamed sabras, a local fruit that is prickly on the outside and sweet on the inside. As well-known as this description may be, I am forever amazed at how complex the Israeli mentality really is.

Amid the chaos of a government in shambles, a complex debate on Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's Gaza disengagement plan, and harsh international criticisms of the state in light of the recent International Court of Justice decision and subsequent UN General Assembly resolution against Israel's security barrier, it was nice to see Israelis rejoicing over Arik Ze'evi's Olympic bronze medal in judo.

As the Olympics began, Israeli newspapers were filled with athlete profiles and discussions of medal hopes, not at all unlike the way Canadian media were obsessed with our athletes' prospects.

But Israel, being Israel, could not even participate in the Olympics without intrusions from the political arena.

One of the Israeli judokas, Ehud Yaks, was set to fight an Iranian opponent in the first round of the Olympic Judo tournament, but the Iranian reportedly said he was unwilling to fight an opponent who represented Israel. He wanted to stand in solidarity with the Palestinian people. The Iranian showed up for the match overweight and was promptly disqualified.

When it came time for the International Judo Federation to rule on the propriety of the Iranian's conduct, it determined that he could not be penalized for his weight gain. Supposedly, there was no proof that he withdrew from the match for political reasons.

Yaks consequently received a bye to the next round, where he lost to his opponent. His teammate Ze'evi, a fellow judoka in a different weight class, went on to win the bronze and bask in the pride of the tiny nation standing behind him. The lack of sportsmanship that marked the beginning of the Judo tournament gave way to jubilation and celebration.

It seems this about the only way to for Israelis to cope.

And so the prickly façade of the sabra comes to make a bit of sense. Sometimes, your guard has to go up to shield you from the constant onslaught of criticism, and to escape the self-doubt that comes with trying to hold your ground in a precarious political environment.

> The beauty of being in Israel for any amount of time is watching that guard come down

The beauty of being in Israel for any amount of time, though, is watching that guard come down and seeing the pride on the faces of everyone from cab drivers to storekeepers who, after a few words to break the ice, will tell you how happy they are to see you visiting and experiencing what Israel has to offer.

And that's what the world ought to know about but doesn't. Political debates aren't going to end any time soon, nor does it seem that Israel will escape incidents like the one in the Olympic judo competition any time soon.

In the meantime, we need to cut through Israel's prickly outer surface to find, and cherish, the sweet inner core.

The Kirshner File

Libya is emerging from its pariah status

Moammar Gadhafi, the leader of Libya and the bad boy of the Middle East, has mellowed in a remarkable transformation that has surprised the region.

Gadhafi, who seized power in a bloodless coup d'état 35 years ago on Sept. 1, has shifted course in a concerted attempt to end Libya's long isolation, modernize its economy, buff up its image as a law-abiding nation opposed to terrorism and improve its frayed relations with the West, particularly the United States and the European Union.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Gadhafi's gradual metamorphosis, from a fiery revolutionary who funded and encouraged a wide spectrum of terrorists into a pragmatic and seemingly respectable statesman who brands Al Qaeda as "a common enemy," has been one of the most startling conversions in the annals of the modern Middle East.

Gadhafi has renounced nuclear, chemical and biological weapons and promised to eliminate them from Libya's arsenal. He has also floated a trial balloon hinting he may be ready to establish diplomatic relations with his arch nemesis, Israel, and invited Libyan Jews back to their former homes.

Last January, in his State of the Union address to Congress, U.S. President George W. Bush suggested that his war on terrorism since Sept. 11, 2001, as well as his subsequent overthrow of Saddam Hussein of Iraq, lay at the heart of Gadhafi's strategic decision to dismantle his stock of weapons of mass destruction and seek better ties with the West.

It is a seductive theory, but it's not really true. The process that is bringing Gadhafi closer to his goal of attaining international respectability began in the late 1990s, a good four years before the United States' invasion of Iraq. It was then that he correctly concluded that Libya stood no chance of breaking its pariah status and shaking off United Nations economic sanctions unless it normalized its adversarial relationship with the United States.

With these objectives in mind, Libya initiated secret talks with the United States. But Libyan negotiators were told in no uncertain terms by the Clinton administration that Libya could not come out of the cold until it acknowledged its role in the downing of Pan Am Flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland, in December 1988, with a loss of 280 lives. By all accounts, Gadhafi regarded this incident as revenge for the U.S. bombing raids of Tripoli and Benghazi in April 1986, which claimed the life of his adopted daughter.

According to Flynt Leverett, the senior director for Middle Eastern affairs at the U.S. National Security Council from 2002 to 2003, these discussions produced a breakthrough. In 1999, Libya extradited two officials, Abdel Basset Ali-Maghrahi and Laman Khalifa Fhimah, who planted a bomb aboard that doomed airplane. Subsequently, Libya agreed to a $2.7 billion (US) compensation package.

In 1999, Gadhafi also agreed to compensate the families of the 170 victims of UTA flight 772 – a French aircraft whose destruction over Niger in 1989 was traced back to Libyan agents – and to discuss his armoury of weapons of mass destruction.

On Dec. 19, 2003, nine months after the United States and its allies invaded Iraq, and three months after the UN lifted economic sanctions imposed in 1992 to punish Libya for initially refusing to hand over Maghrahi and Fhimah, Libya's foreign ministry announced the plan to phase out these armaments. British Prime Minister Tony Blair hailed the announcement as "historic and courageous."

Since then, Gadhafi has allowed teams of monitors from the International Atomic Energy Agency to inspect nuclear, biological and chemical sites in Libya and to remove banned equipment. In addition, Gadhafi has promised to convert Libya's Scud-B missiles into shorter-range, less powerful weapons for purely defensive purposes and to end all military trade with North Korea (which exports missiles to the Mideast), Iran (which is trying to develop an atomic capability) and Syria (which reportedly has an array of chemical weapons).

Mohammed El Baradei, the UN's chief inspector, said recently that Libya's nuclear program was only in its early stages of development, far behind that of Iran's. The UN discovered that Libya acquired blueprints from that infamous Pakistani scientist, Abdul Qadeer Khan, and that North Korea provided Libya with almost two tons of uranium in early 2001.

Five months ago, Gadhafi's son, Seif al-Islam, told the London-based Arab daily Al Hayat that Libya had sought nuclear weapons in preparation for a future war with Israel.

In a further bid to appease the United States, Libya's major foe, Gadhafi pledged last month to pay $35 million (US) to some of the victims of the April 1986 bombing of the LaBelle disco in Berlin, which killed two American soldiers and a Turkish woman and wounded many others.

The settlement applies to the non-American victims of the attack. Lawyers are currently working on a compensation package for the Americans injured in the La Belle bombing.

The Libyan foreign minister, Shukri Ghanem, frankly says that Libya is "buying peace" with the United States and the European Union. Certainly, these measures have paid tangible dividends.

This past March, Blair met Gadhafi in Tripoli, describing his mission as a reward for Libya's decision to surrender its weapons of mass destruction and to investigate the 1984 murder of Yvonne Fletcher, a young British police officer killed by a person from inside the Libyan embassy in London.

Before leaving Tripoli, Blair announced that Shell, a British oil company, had won a $200 million (US) contract for natural gas exploration in Libya.

In the wake of Blair's trip, Gadhafi visited Brussels, the headquarters of the European Union, and urged countries that possess weapons of mass destruction to emulate his example. Then he declared, "Libya is determined to play a leading role in achieving world peace."

This was music to the ears of Romano Prodi, a top European Union official, who said that Libya was now a candidate for membership in its regional aid and trade program.

Moammar Gadhafi

Best of all, from Gadhafi's viewpoint, his rapprochement with the West is having the desired effect on the United States – which closed its embassy in Libya in 1979, severed relations, excoriated Libya as a sponsor of state terrorism, imposed economic sanctions and banned the import of Libyan oil.

These devastating sanctions, which coincided with a brief period of American armed clashes with Libya in the Gulf of Sirte, virtually crippled the Libyan economy and appeared to imperil Gadhafi's iron grip on power.

Since Gadhafi's about-face late last year, Washington has reassessed its attitude toward Libya.

Last winter, the U.S. State Department lifted restrictions on the use of American passports for travel to Libya, whose Greek and Roman ruins are a great draw. Shortly afterward, the commander of the U.S. Marine Corps, Gen. James Jones, said that Libya's renunciation of weapons of mass destruction marked the first step in its rehabilitation and opened the way for it to become a valuable partner in the struggle against terrorism.

Four months ago, praising Libya's "excellent co-operation," the United States eased economic sanctions on Libya. This enables American oil companies with assets in Libya – Occidental Petroleum, ConocoPhillips, Marathon Oil and Amerada Hess – to do business there once again.

In June, the United States resumed diplomatic relations with Libya by opening a liaison office in Tripoli. The Bush administration then lifted its opposition to Libya's entry into the World Trade Organization.

Amid these developments, there has been a flurry of reports indicating that Libya may forge ties with Israel, whose existence Gadhafi has consistently reviled.

Last December, an Israeli diplomat, Ron Prosor, reportedly met an Arab official in Paris to inquire about whether Libya would be interested in relations with Israel. In January, Ephraim Sneh, a Labour party Knesset member and a former cabinet minister, met Gadhafi's son at an academic conference and said that Libya might recognize Israel. Then an Israeli Arab newspaper reported that a Libyan delegation had secretly visited Israel.

As these reports surfaced, Gadhafi's son invited Libyan Jews to return and apply for compensation for properties left behind or confiscated by the government. Libya, in 1970, passed a law allowing Jews – and Italians – to be compensated for lost properties, but it was never formally enacted

Despite all these promising signs, Gadhafi, an ardent Arab nationalist, remains hostile to Israel. Three months ago, Libya pulled out of the bidding to host the 2010 World Cup after saying it would not permit Israel to participate. Libya also barred "the Zionist enemy" from taking part in the World Chess Championship held in Tripoli in July.

And Gadhafi himself has called for a binational state – which he has dubbed Isratine – in place of Israel.

Gadhafi may be changing, but he still hates Israel with every fibre of his being.

Volunteers: the lifeblood of UJA's campaign

Close to 1,000 volunteers from Toronto's Jewish community are already hard at work doing everything they can to ensure the success of UJA Federation Campaign 2005, launched just days ago.

The volunteers – from a broad spectrum of the Jewish community and UJA Federation divisions - are involved in virtually every aspect of the annual campaign, from contacting more than 25,000 donors, to helping out with special events around the community.

"Like any successful fundraising organization, the committed and passionate volunteers who stand behind UJA Federation's annual campaign are the lifeblood of its success, year in and year out," says campaign director Jeff Springer. "They are truly the unsung heroes, giving selflessly of themselves to ensure all of us - in Toronto and in Israel - a secure Jewish future."

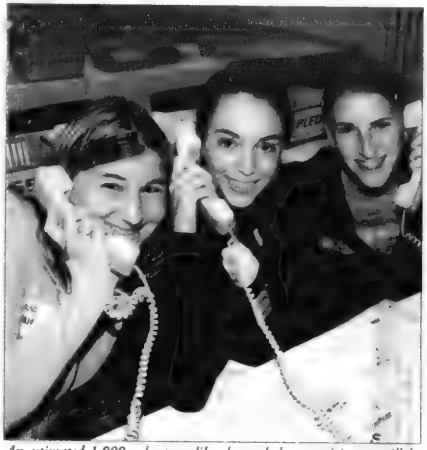
One of those unsung heroes is 23-year-old college student Regan Tessis, vice chair of Campaign 2005's Young Adult Division, and a relative newcomer to the world of Jewish volunteerism.

"After my birthright israel trip last August, I wanted to get involved in the work done by UJA Federation," says the enthusiastic Tessis. "I love the fact that I get to play an important role in giving back to our community here, and help the people of Israel too. My main goal is to work with younger people, and get them involved in donating to the campaign so that they have their foot in the door and become the next generation of Jewish philanthropists."

"Volunteering is about integrity and passion," says Dodi Weill, chair, along with Brad Fox, of UJA Federation's Volunteer Relations Committee. "It is about having a sense of purpose and keeping meaning in our lives. It is about making the choice to give back. There is no better way to get involved with our community and to learn about the needs both here and in Israel."

Brad Fox and Dodi Weill, Chairs of UJA Federation's Volunteer Relations Committee.

"I find it extremely satisfying to take people who at first are reticent or uncomfortable in their role and making them into successful canvassers, helping alleviate the barriers and their fears," says Fox. "When I look at the job that they do, I think about how they can have such a direct impact and influence on the lives of so many people, both here and in Israel."



An estimated 1,000 volunteers like these telethon participants will be taking part in UJA Federation Campaign 2005.

Toronto's first security task force

Warren Kimel describes it as a wake-up call for the community. Kimel, the chair of UJA Federation's Task Force on Community Security, is talking about the rash of antisemitic incidents in Toronto this spring, which prompted the creation of the Task Force, a first for the city.

Warren Kimel

"UJA Federation's Task Force is our response to the alarming level of antisemitism around the world," says Kimel.

If the Toronto incidents were not alarming enough, the firebombing of the United Talmud Torah day school in Montreal during Passover was a further reminder of Jewish community vulnerability.

"Task Force members, with the assistance of specialists in the field, will be reviewing security at dozens of facilities and making recommendations about new measures to protect our community. Raising funds to finance enhanced community security is a key component of UJA Federation Campaign 2005, which is currently underway," says Kimel.

A recent spate of antisemitic acts around the GTA was publicly condemned by community leaders including York Region Police Chief Armand LeBarge.

Community leader will be sorely missed

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

When David Marks recently lost his battle with cancer, Toronto's Jewish community lost a true friend and respected leader.

A selfless and devoted member of the community, Marks, who passed away on August 18 at age 77, served as UJA Federation's campaign director for an unparalleled 14 years beginning in 1968, an accomplishment that speaks volumes about the man.

"I never had the pleasure of working under Dave Marks, as I came to UJA after his departure from the organization," says UJA Federation president Ted Sokolsky. "However, I did get to know him personally after he left UJA because he agreed to stay on as chair of the UJA Communal Professional Division as a volunteer leader. Dave quickly became a very important mentor for me in my early years at UJA. Dave was always a model of what a Jewish communal professional can be: an inspiration to all those who worked with him over the years. He was truly a professional's professional and the community will continue to benefit from the seeds he planted. Dave was instrumental in helping UJA Federation of Greater Toronto become one of the leading campaigns in the Jewish world."

The youngest of three brothers, the Toronto-born Marks moved to Hamilton with his new wife Helen, where they opened a shoe store. After eight years, they decided the footwear business was not for them and they returned to Toronto. That was the start of a wonderful legacy.

In 1962, Dave Marks accepted a position as the manager of sheltered workshops for Jewish Vocational Services (JVS). That led him to UJA Federation where he rose quickly to become campaign director. It was in this new position that – despite any formal training – Marks became recognized as an expert in fundraising, and more importantly, as a caring and devoted community leader.

"He was one of those few gentlemen who was known and respected for his integrity," says Jerome Diamond, a man who worked with Marks during Diamond's years as executive director of Jewish Family & Child Service.

"He was such a good man, such a mensch," says Gerry Halbert, who has been involved with UJA's annual campaigns since 1960. "Of all his tremendous accomplishments, I'd say that the 1973 Yom Kippur War Campaign he oversaw was the best. Under his stewardship, we raised $26 million in so little time.

Marks, who organized and led some of the earliest UJA study missions to Israel, traveled to Israel more than 30 times and organized visits to Toronto by such luminaries as David Ben Gurion, Golda Meir, Menachem Begin, Moshe Dayan, and others. The Marks household also hosted many dinners for visiting Israeli army officers.

"Dave had a mind like a steel trap. I was amazed at how he knew so much about so many people in the community," says Mark Gryfe, UJA campaign director from 1989 to 1995. "That's how much he cared."

The August 30 campaign launch, at Toronto's Fairmont Royal York Hotel, included an address by Ambassador Dan Gillerman, Israel's representative at the United Nations, and a musical performance by Tzofei - Tel Aviv.

This year's campaign is an action plan for a safe Jewish future that will see new dollars invested in four key areas.

• Community Security: UJA Federation has initiated a special community Task Force to review local security needs, especially at school and community centres.

• A Strong Jewish Voice: UJA Federation is supporting the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) and other organizations, which stand up for Israel and speak forcefully against antisemitism.

• Building a Stronger Israel: Campaign 2005 will invest in several important programs with an emphasis on young people, victims of terror, new immigrants and Israel's vulnerable.

• Empowering a New Jewish Generation: Campaign 2005 will invest in training programs for young adults to help them counter antisemitism, and initiatives to build a stronger connection to Israel and Jewish life such as birthright israel and March of the Living.

"One of the issues that unfortunately remains a constant is the fight against the ongoing resurgence of antisemitism," says Robert Harlang, chair of Campaign 2005, along with Chuck Winograd. "We must be vigilant in Toronto, in Canada, and around the world."

"Needless to say, the Jewish community in Toronto and the State of Israel are both important parts of my family's life," says Winograd. "The opportunity to give back to both is a privilege. The bottom line in any campaign is raising money to serve the needs of both our local community and Israel."

"This is a campaign to benefit Jews everywhere," says Campaign 2005 vice chair Ariella Rohringer . "We need the funds to secure Toronto's schools and community centres because of recent acts of antisemitism and hate. This is a new and unfortunate reality in Toronto and around the world."

Jewish identity programs grow

By REBECCA GLUCK SOBERMAN
UJA Federation

When an unprecedented group of 18,000 people from around the world take part in the March of the Living next year, Toronto's Jewish community will be strongly represented by an impressive delegation of Jewish and non-Jewish students and adults.

March of the Living 2005, supported in Toronto by UJA Federation, will mark the 60th anniversary of the Allied victory against the Nazis in World War II.

March of the Living is an educational journey that explores Jewish life in Poland, before and during the Holocaust, with visits to concentration camp sites during Holocaust Memorial Day, followed by a tour in Israel coinciding with Israel's Remembrance Day and Independence Day.

"If we want to ensure our children are properly educated and equip them with the tools to defend their identity, we must invest in them through the programs that build their Jewish confidence," remarks Hilda Cohen, National Chair, March of the Living 2005.

Some 18,000 people from around the world are expected to take part in next year's March of the Living.

Another important Jewish identity program, backed by UJA Federation Campaign 2005, is birthright israel, which has already attracted 6,000 young people from Toronto, ages 18-26, since its inception in 2000.

Programs like birthright israel offer educational experiences that empower a younger generation.

The program, which offers organized, no-cost visits to Israel for qualifying young adults, is funded by Jewish Federations, North American philanthropists and the government of Israel.

At least 1,200 Canadians – half from Toronto – are expected to join birthright israel in its upcoming 2004-2005 winter season.

"Since my trip I have actively become more involved in understanding Israel's history, and her complicated political situation and, of course, how Jews as a whole, or as individuals, are connected to Israel," says Elias Parker, who participated on a recent summer program and has already returned to Israel for a fellowship program.

Strong Jewish voices

In just eight months, membership in CIJA-PAC, Canada's grass roots advocacy organization, has grown to 2,000. CIJA-PAC is an arm of CIJA - the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy, which is strongly supported by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

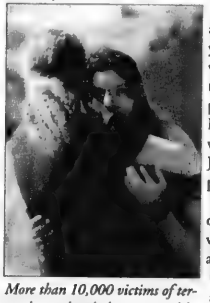
The UJA Federation annual campaign will also provide significant funding for Hillel of Greater Toronto, representing Jewish university and college students. At Hillel, plans are already taking shape for the annual JUMP (Jewish University Multi-Track Program), a weekend conference in October focused on Israel advocacy. Hillel will be bringing in top-notch speakers, including Israeli author Amos Oz, Professor Naomi Chazan, and David Baker, spokesman for Israel's Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

With the support of UJA Federation, Hillel of Greater Toronto will be expanding its programming for Jewish students.

"Our goal is to elevate and strengthen the programming provided on campus," says Tilly Shames, Hillel's Director of Israel Affairs. "Our three priorities for Israel Affairs this year will be enhanced pluralism, partnership and participation. "In working with others in the community, we find we can raise the level of our programming and reach out to greater numbers on campus," adds Shames.

Thousands helped by Israeli fund

Since its inception in February 2002, the Jewish Agency's Fund to Aid Victims of Terror, backed by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, has distributed over $13.5 million to 2,400 families – bettering the lives of more than 10,000 people. UJA Federation has contributed $3 million toward the fund.



More than 10,000 victims of terror have already been assisted by the Victims of Terror Fund.

"I was fortunate to remain alive after the horrific terror attack this year, on January 29. After the very difficult experience I went through, the fund's assistance was particularly important," says Maria Novikov, who was injured when a suicide bomber blew up Jerusalem bus #19 and killed 11 people.

The Victims of Terror Fund is one of many Israel initiatives to which UJA Federation will be allocating contributions from Campaign 2005. Others include assistance for low income Israelis and youth at risk.

Canadian Race Relations Foundation's Mock honoured by Ohio museum as one of '100 heroes'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Karen Mock, executive director of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation, is in elite company as one of 100 "heroes" honoured by Cincinnati's National Underground Railroad Freedom Center.

The new museum, which opened last week to commemorate the 19th-century route followed by African-American slaves on their quest for freedom, includes a permanent exhibit featuring modern-day heroes, among them Mock and former South African president Nelson Mandela.

"I certainly would call myself one of the everyday people," said Mock in a phone interview last week. "It's such an amazing honour to be included."

In fact, the honorees are listed as "everyday freedom heroes," but include such names as the Dalai Lama, boxer Muhammad Ali, cello master Pablo Casals, Indian leader Mohandas Gandhi, civil rights activist Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., baseball player Jackie Robinson, and Nobel prize winner Archbishop Desmond Tutu.

Karen Mock

Canadian Aid to Southern Sudan and Craig Kielburger, founder of Kids Can Free the Children, join Mock in representing Canada.

Other Jewish honorees include Rabbi Perry Nussbaum, who initiated interfaith services with African-American colleagues in Civil Rights-era Mississipi. Sempo Sugihara, former Japanese consul to Kovno, is among those honoured for saving Jews during the Holocaust.

Mock's involvement in anti-racism work dates back to her days as a professor of education, when she made a point of including multiculturalism in her curriculum. She served 12 years as national director of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights before joining the CRRF in 2001.

Jewish Life

Never on a Sunday?

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Roots & Remembrance

Deputy Magistrate Kingsford of Toronto had his hands full one October day in 1900 when two Jewish butchers and a Jewish baker appeared before him, all charged with violating the Lord's Day Act by pursuing their callings on a Sunday.

One of the butchers was actually Rabbi Isaac Helpern, spiritual leader of the Austrian Jewish Synagogue on Chestnut Street. Helpern swore that all the people who had been observed leaving his shop with packages of meat on Sunday had actually purchased them on Saturday night and that he had merely kept the meat in his ice chest overnight. He was fined $5.

The other butcher, A. Gauffman, denied all the charges against him so vigorously that the judge surmised he could not understand English and arranged for an interpreter. Still, he maintained his denial. His fine was also $5.

"He threw his hands palm upwards in the air and almost wept when the fine was announced," the Toronto Star reported.

The third accused, baker Harry Rosenbes of York Street, pursued a more respectful attitude towards the law and fell upon the mercy of the court.

Rosenbes explained "that as Saturday was the Jewish Sabbath and that Monday and Tuesday were religious holidays, on which it was unlawful to purchase bread, he had been forced to extend his deliveries into Sunday.

"He said he had worked from sundown Saturday until midnight, but that there was such an immense quantity of bread that he had been unable to deliver it all. He was warned to secure more help on Saturday night in future, and the case was withdrawn."

These cases were by no means unusual. Many people recall how stringently the Lord's Day Act was applied in Toronto in the 1920s and 1930s, when even the most innocent child's play could constitute a serious breach of the law. One of my cousins retains a vivid memory of a baton-swinging policeman chasing him and his friends from a city park for the dangerous infraction of playing ball on a Sunday.

Jack Switzer, an Alberta Jewish historian, recently wrote an article about a memorable application of Lord's Day legislation in Calgary in 1905, shortly before the territory became a Canadian province. The incident focused on Harry Bell, a 14-year-old Jewish newsboy in Calgary who was prosecuted for hawking newspapers on Sunday.

Bell had been selling the previous day's Winnipeg Free Press, which had just arrived by train. He went to trial in July 1905, only weeks before the province of Alberta was born. He was charged with violating statutes that had been instituted by King Charles II of Britain in 1675. The magistrate gave a careful reading of the law, however, and ruled that since he wasn't a "tradesman" and had not been engaged at his "ordinary calling," he could not be found guilty.

As Switzer noted in the Journal of the Jewish Historical Society of Southern Alberta, public reaction to Bell's acquittal was quite favourable. "The effort to make an example of a 14-year-old boy... is calculated to bring the forces behind the prosecution into disrepute," pronounced the Calgary Herald. "The whole thing is too comical to be received seriously."

But trivial prosecutions continued, Switzer noted, such as that against Calgary grocer Isadore Guttman, who in 1918 was fined $10 for selling candy on Sunday. Such penalties were typically doled out across Canada for decades until the Supreme Court struck down the Lord's Day Act in 1985.

As one observer noted, the act "created a climate hostile to, and gave the appearance of discrimination against, non-Christian Canadians" and so "could not be deemed justifiable in a free and democratic society such as Canada."

My best birthday card ever

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Through A Sephardi Window

I suppose it happens to all of us. We all reach the age when our birthday comes and goes with very little notice. For a young child, a birthday is an occasion, one anticipated with much excitement. For the elderly, others may make a fuss about their age, but for those of us in middle age, the day comes and goes with almost no notice.

For many years, the only card I received in the mail was from my life insurance agent. This year seemed to be proceeding pretty much the same way, until I received the most wonderful birthday greeting ever.

It came in a pale blue envelope, a birthday card with the words, "Happy Birthday Saba." A card from a grandchild – my first one, no less!

These sentiments may not seem uncommon, but I wish to share them with you on a different level.

I am an individual of the Diaspora. I was born in Morocco, as were my ancestors going back more than 400 years. Before that, my ancestors lived in Spain. I still live in the Diaspora, in Toronto, where I raise my family, and, alas, I have always felt quite guilty for doing so.

And then this birthday card came, all the way from Jerusalem, from my very own precious newborn granddaughter. I have yet to meet her, yet I know that I love her very much. To be sure, as a month-old baby, she neither wrote nor sent me this card herself, but it nevertheless meant the world to me.

That's because my first and only grandchild was born in Israel. This little baby was able to accomplish something that both my ancestors and I were not able to do in 2,000 years. As much as I miss her and would like to watch every step of her development, I am comforted in the knowledge that she was born and will live her life in the best place in the world. She will communicate naturally in Hebrew, and her mind will likewise function in Hebrew (unlike her old grandfather, who, while speaking several languages, thinks in Spanish, does his math in French and only prays in Hebrew).

How proud I am that my son and his wife made Israel their home. How so much prouder I am that their child was born to them there. And how I rejoice that she will close the cycle of the Diaspora, at least for my family, whose millennia-long sojourn around the Mediterranean has finally ended in the Holy Land.

Exploring the Zohar

The Essential Zohar* by Rav P. S. Berg, Random House, $21 (paperbound).

Books

Bernard Baskin

Not too long ago, Jewish thinkers and historians reprehended the mystical side of religion as unworthy of serious study and not an essential part of mainstream Judaism. Enlightened rationalists, they were embarrassed by what they regarded as rank superstition and erratic flights of unrestrained imagination.

Today, in a new age of spiritual quest and yearning, works of mysticism have achieved respectability and a secure place in the Jewish literary canon.

In recent months, I have been making my way through the difficult pages of the new English translation and commentary of the Zohar by Daniel Matt. My progress has been slow and halting.

This ambitious work took six years of painstaking work and detailed research. The contemplated nine other volumes will involve an additional 12 years. The entire project is being underwritten by Margot Pritzker, wife of the chair of the Hyatt Corporation.

The first volume includes the original Zohar introduction, along with consideration of material in the book of Genesis. The second volume consists of a commentary on the patriarchal narratives. Each volume contains elaborate and detailed footnotes that make up the greater part of each page.

The Zohar (Book of Splendor), purportedly written by Moses de Leon in 13th-century Spain, attempts to penetrate into the inner recesses of God, conceived of as the "Divine Life." The entire universe is a vast symbol of God's innumerable mysteries.

For the Zohar, the sefirot are the 10 stages of the divine world through which God descends, from the innermost recesses of his concealment down to his manifestation in the Shechinah, a heavenly archetype of the community of Israel.

When the contrasting life forces (e.g. grace and stern judgment) are harmoniously balanced, the Shechinah (conceived in female imagery) is united with the upper (male) sefirot and the abundance of energy flows harmoniously into the world. There is a markedly erotic quality to the description of the bold union of the male and female aspects of the deity. When there is a defect in the proper conjunction of the upper sefirot, disorder, chaos and evil result.

The reader is transported to an enchanted realm where each word, or even each letter, of scripture can take on cosmic meaning. But the approach and methodology are daunting, complex and opaque.

The Torah, for the Zohar, is an actual manifestation of the divine. Hence, the author of the Zohar is less interested in the literal meaning of events described in the Bible than in the theosophical mysteries that are their inner, and therefore more real, meaning.

The basic premise of the Zohar is that there exists a complete correspondence between the lower and the upper worlds. Consequently, a quickening from below can arouse a quickening above. Hence, deeds and prayers have cosmic significance.

One scholar has described the Zohar as "a mixture of theosophic theology, mystical psychology and anthropology, myth, and poetry. Old gnostic doctrines, mystical traditions, theurgies, popular superstitions and mythological motifs dwell side by side with theories about the nature of the cosmos and about the relationship between a transcendent God and a finite world."

Rav P. S. Berg is dean and co-director of the Kabbalah Center. In the introduction to his brief book of Zohar excerpts, he maintains, among other dubious assertions, that only Rabbi Shaimon bar Yochai, a second-century C.E. sage, could have composed the work.

He is certain that with the Zohar becoming more accessible to people throughout the world, we are witness to the start of a new source of revelation. Exaggeration and hyperbole aside, the book's assorted excerpts are worth reading.

Slichot on the web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

On Sunday, Sept. 12, people will travel to their synagogues midway through the night. And they will return early every weekday until Yom Kippur. They will come to take stock of their behaviour over the past year and prepare themselves for the coming one – and to recite Slichot. Today, a look at these traditional prayers of forgiveness – and some modern aids – thanks to the web.

The central phrase in the Slichot service is the recitation of the 13 Attributes of Mercy that were recited as Moses received the second set of tablets at Mount Sinai. [www.jhom.com/calendar/elul/selihot.html] "God passed by before [Moses] and proclaimed, 'Merciful God, merciful God, powerful God, compassionate and gracious, slow to anger, and abundant in kindness and truth. Preserver of kindness for thousands of generations, forgiver of iniquity, wilful sin and error, and Who cleanses." (Exodus 34:6) [www.ou.org/chagim/elul/selichotattrib.htm]

Rabbi Yitzchak Berkowitz asks why we spend so much effort reciting the God's attributes. Shouldn't we focus on our own spiritual growth rather than invoking this phrase? He then suggests that in order to grow, we need to make sure our own lifestyles reflect these Godly attributes. "For example, the Talmud says that if you are patient with others, then God will be patient with you. You can only demand that God employ all these attributes if you apply them in your own relationships." [http://tinyurl.com/7y89v].

Actually, it is only Ashkenazi Jews who are about to start reciting Slichot. Sephardim have been rising early since the start of the month of Elul and will continue to do so for 40 days (excluding Shabbat) until Yom Kippur. You can read a description of what it is like to arrive bleary-eyed early mornings at Magain David Sephardim Congregation in San Francisco. [www.jewishsf.com/bk960830/sfayom.htm]

Rabbi Mark Hurvitz of Congregation Etz Chaim in Ramona, Calif., has taken many of the concepts of Slichot and given them a modern spin. His Slichot "grid worksheet" looks like a bingo card, except the squares contain comments such as "I have done things to others that I would not want done to myself" or "I've said: 'I won't.' But then did." The goal is to ask people to sign a square that is true about themselves and presumably promote discussion about repentance and forgiveness. [http://tinyurl.com/5swk3] For more practical suggestions about getting yourself into shape, check out Aish HaTorah's growth worksheet. [http://tinyurl.com/4a352]

Once you've finished your recitation of Slichot, why go to sleep when you could watch a video or two? Larry Mark, editor of JewishFilm.com has created a list of films for Slichot-time viewing. About The Quarrel Mark comments, "Two men meet in a park in a rainstorm. They chose different paths. Can forgiveness be reached?" For Crimes and Misdemeanors, he says, "One of Woody Allen's best is a jumping-off point to discuss sins and getting caught, choices, consequences, the lack of consequences, acceptance, and human nature." And here's Mark's take on Bill Murray's never-ending Groundhog Day. "Repeating past mistakes over and over… until tshuvah is made." [http://tinyurl.com/3zdyl]

As the time for Slichot approaches, we are reminded that soon God will soon be judging us for our actions. Writing at the Tikkun magazine website, Estelle Frankel tells the marvellous tale of a chasidic master who refused to look upon any Jew harshly, particularly at this critical time of the year. [http://tinyurl.com/6ex3y]

While on his way to Slichot services on the eve of Rosh Hashanah, a sudden downpour forced Reb Levi Yitzchak of Berditchov and his assistant to seek shelter at a tavern. The assistant commented on how the Jews inside were feasting and drinking and revelling, rather than praying to God for forgiveness. The rebbe rebuked his assistant for finding fault in the Jews and said that surely they must be reciting blessings over their food and drink. And when the assistant pointed out that he had overheard two Jews talking about thefts they had committed, the rebbe again refused to condemn them. Instead, he "concluded that, indeed, they must be holy Jews since they were confessing their sins to one another before Rosh Hashanah!"

Distinguishing between rejectionism, pragmatism

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Two items this week:

Prominent reviews of former U.S. Mideast peace envoy Dennis Ross' new 840-page book, The Missing Peace: The Inside Story of the Fight for Middle East Peace, have been very positive. In particular, they have agreed, to one degree or another, with Ross' central argument that Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat rejected a chance for a viable Palestinian state at Camp David in the summer of 2000 and in the following months.

Ross has made this point consistently since the time he headed the U.S. negotiating team under former president Bill Clinton. Now he lays out all the details and effectively counters those who want to equate tactical errors in former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak's negotiating style with Arafat's strategic decision not to halt the conflict between Israelis and Palestinians but rather to resort once again to violence.

Ethan Bonner's piece in the New York Times Sunday books section (Aug. 8), Max Boot's review for the daily New York Times (Aug. 18) and even the Economist's more qualified review (Aug. 14), all commend Ross for making his case.

But if anyone remains unconvinced, a growing number of Palestinians, such as respected writer Tawfik Abu Baker and former PA cabinet minister Nabil Amr, are making similar claims. Then there is Arafat himself, who, in a recent Ha'aretz interview (June 21) for the first time – and very belatedly accepted the Clinton bridging proposals that Barak originally endorsed. Finally, Clinton himself in recent interviews about his own book, My Life, has emphasized this very point.

Will this settle the argument once and for all? Almost certainly not. But rarely has a historical truth been more in need of acceptance.

Such understanding would at last disabuse those numerous critics who rationalize Palestinian violence as "justified resistance to occupation." Yet it is Arafat and his rejectionist policies that prolong "occupation" and bring misery to Palestinians and Israelis alike. (Israelis have, unjustifiably, borne the blame for too long.)

Which leads us to this week's second item…

"As Israelis hold their breath, it is time for the outside world to adjust its thinking about [Prime Minister Ariel] Sharon. He will never be the toast of peaceniks [as the architect of the settlement policy]… But Mr. Sharon does seem at last to have learnt that Israel cannot hold on to all the land it conquered in 1967, and is risking all by beginning the process of withdrawal. That is why the settlers are determined to defeat him – and why he deserves the world's support."

That passage comes not from a liberal Zionist publication but from an editorial in the Aug. 21 Economist. For this influential British publication – which has often been critical of Israel and dismissive of its current prime minister – to call for world support of Sharon marks a radical departure from its earlier stance.

In the Globe and Mail, Marcus Gee arrived at a similar conclusion when he evaluated the difficulties Sharon faces within his own Likud Party as he attempts to push forward with a unilateral disengagement from Gaza ("For peace's sake, pray for Sharon," Aug. 25). Like the Economist, Gee does not hide Sharon's blemishes, but he recognizes the Israeli leader's pragmatism for what it is.

Holiday Food Ideas

Editorial

During the High Holy Days, as we take part in such rituals as praying to God to be inscribed in the Book of Life for the coming year, throwing bread crumbs into a body of water to cast away our sins, and blowing the shofar as an expression of God's sovereignty, Jews around the world are performing the same rituals.

As well, Jews worldwide gather around a holiday table with family and friends and partake of traditional foods that symbolize our hope for a sweet and prosperous new year.

Loved ones who are separated during holiday time can take comfort in the fact that those who are at a distance are all celebrating the holiday in much the same way. They serve sweet holiday foods such as apples dipped in honey, round challahs that represent the never-ending circle of life, and pomegranates whose seeds represent a new year filled with many mitzvot.

Holiday foods are incorporated into favourite dishes such as Bubbie's apple cake, Aunt Cynthia's honey cake or cousin Sue's sweet kugel.

For most of us, an enjoyable aspect of the holiday includes trading recipes and sharing cooking tips and family customs.

We at The CJN also like to share special recipes and customs, and as the holidays draw near, we've gathered some of them together so that our readers can add to their own favourites or learn how others celebrate the holidays. One family's traditional dish could easily turn into another family's favourite.

From all of us at The CJN, we wish you happy cooking, and most of all, a shanah tovah.

— C.B.

Holiday Food Ideas

Symbolic foods add meaning to your holiday

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

When the Second Temple was destroyed in 70 CE, it changed forever the way we worship, conduct our daily lives and celebrate. The Essential Book of Jewish Festival Cooking (HarperCollins) by Phyllis Glazer with her sister, Miriyam Glazer, explains, through mouth-watering recipes and their fascinating origins, how our holidays, once agricultural markers of the seasons, were remoulded by the rabbis and sages in the Diaspora.

"There's a beautiful line in one of the Psalms: 'How can we sing the Lord's song in a strange land?'" noted Miriyam, a professor of literature and rabbinical student at the University of Judaism in Los Angeles, "and so the rabbis looked for scriptural evidence in the Bible itself in order to preserve the festivals."

Where once our ancestors rejoiced at first bloom and harvest, in exile they "could no longer see the blossoming of the almond tree in winter, summer's profusion of white squill flowers or the ripening of the wheat in spring."

"After the destruction of the Second Temple," observed Phyllis, visiting California from her home in Israel, where she is a columnist, cookbook author and food consultant, "there were no familiar signs of nature for the people to follow in their new land. The rabbis sought to save the holidays and give them other meanings."

"There's no holiday called Rosh Hashanah in the Bible," noted Miriyam. "All that's in the Bible is Yom Truah, the day of the blowing of the shofar. God says, 'And there will be a day for gathering for you and blowing of the shofar.' Centuries later, Rosh Hashanah evolved because, although our New Year had been in the spring, the culture our ancestors were living in had a New Year celebration in the fall. All of the holidays as we know them today are the products of hundreds of years of discussion that are captured in the Talmud."

Over the centuries, as the Jewish people found themselves in many lands, layer upon layer of traditions were added to the observance of the festivals. We dip apples into honey to wish each other a sweet year. We eat carrots because the Yiddish word for carrots, merren, also means "more," so we wish for "more" health and wealth at this time.

"It's a mitzvah to eat a food at Rosh Hashanah that you haven't eaten in that season yet," added Miriyam. "That's why we eat pomegranates at Rosh Hashanah. They have just come into season. This gives you an opportunity to say Shehechiyanu."

We eat "hidden" foods at Rosh Hashanah, because it comes at the beginning of the lunar month, when the moon is hidden. "That's echoed in food like kreplach in which you can't see what's inside," noted Miriyam, "just like the moon is hidden at the holiday."

Many observe the ritual of the Seven Blessings tray at Rosh Hashanah. "Seven is a mystical number in the Jewish tradition," said Miriyam. "The world was created in six days and on the seventh day God rested. We have the seven species in the Bible. There's the seven blessings of the wedding (Sheva Brachot), and then there's the blessing tray at Rosh Hashanah."

Before Rosh Hashanah dinner, a tray is passed with seven symbolic foods, each one with its own blessing. Customs vary, but a typical selection would include dates, lubia (green beans or black-eyed peas), leeks, pomegranate, sheep or fish head, beets and carrots.

Challah, so inextricably linked with every celebration, takes various forms for each holiday. "I learned to braid my hair by learning to braid challah," Phyllis recalled of her mother's Sabbath challah. And on Rosh Hashanah we create grand spirals to dip in honey. "Since Rosh Hashanah also celebrates the creation of the world, the round challah is a symbol of the holiness of life and of the life cycle, the endlessness of life," explained Miriyam. "We add raisins for the same reason that we dip apples in honey, to enjoy a sweet new year."

Even Yom Kippur has its own special shape. For our break-the-fast meal, we shape the dough into birds of prayer, "so your prayers will go up to God," noted Miriyam. The custom has its source in Isaiah 31:5: "Like the birds that fly, so will the Lord of Hosts shield Jerusalem, shielding and saving, protecting and rescuing."

Here Phyllis offers a recipe from an Israeli caterer with an unusual texture that comes from semolina (or Cream of Wheat). But instead of perching the challah birds on the classic round challah, she shapes them into rolls. "Though the process of creating the little birds may seem complicated at first," cautions Phyllis, "once you get the hang of it, you'll be able to hatch them out in minutes, if you carefully follow the directions."

CORNISH HENS STUFFED WITH BULGUR, RAISINS, AND CARAWAY

We like to use the small Cornish hens (about 1 to 1¼ lbs.) and serve one per person. If none is available, use the large (1½ to 2½ lbs.) and serve each person a half.

4 Cornish hens, each weighing about 1 lb.

Rub

¼ to ½ tsp. each nutmeg, sweet paprika, black pepper, cardamom, salt and sumac

Stuffing

1 tbsp. olive oil
1 cup chopped onion
1 cup medium bulgur wheat
2 cups boiling water
½ tsp. caraway seeds, toasted in a dry skillet
¼ tsp. ground black pepper
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
¼ tsp. ground cumin
½ cup raisins or currants
½ cup chopped walnuts (optional)
salt to taste

Rinse the Cornish hens and place in a bowl of boiling water. Let stand 1 minute, then remove and scrape gently to remove excess surface fat and any pinfeathers, especially around the wings and legs. Rinse and pat dry.

Mix together the spices for the rub, and rub into the hens on all sides. Place in a baking pan. To prepare the stuffing: Heat the oil in a heavy skillet over medium heat.

Gently sauté the onion over medium low heat about 5 minutes, until translucent, stirring often. Add the bulgur and toasted caraway seeds, stirring frequently, for 2 minutes.

Add the water and spices, stir, and cook covered, over very low heat for 10 to 12 minutes, or until the water is absorbed. Remove from heat, add the raisins, and fluff with a fork.

Cover and let stand 5 minutes. Uncover and cool to room temperature. Preheat the oven to 375. Using a spoon, stuff the hens with the bulgur mixture and tie the legs together (cover the stomach cavity with a flap of skin). Cover lightly with aluminum foil.

Bake for 30 minutes. Lower heat to 350. Remove the cover and continue to bake for 15 to 20 minutes, or until the hens are nicely browned. Serves 4.

HONEY BROWNIES

½ cup butter
6 oz. bittersweet chocolate
4 eggs
½ tsp. salt
¾ cup packed brown sugar
½ cup honey
1 tsp. vanilla extract
1 cup unbleached all-purpose flour
1 cup chopped pecans or walnuts

Preheat oven to 325. Grease and flour a 9-in. square baking pan (or use non-stick cooking spray or parchment paper). Set aside. Melt butter and chocolate in a heavy saucepan over low heat. Set aside to cool. In a medium bowl, beat eggs and salt until fluffy. Add sugar and honey gradually, beating until the mixture is smooth and light. Add the melted chocolate mixture and vanilla. Stir in flour and nuts. Pour into the prepared pan. Bake for 45 to 55 minutes, or until a toothpick inserted in the centre comes out clean. Cut into squares when cool. Makes 16 squares.

MOROCCAN CARROT SALAD

One form or another of Moroccan carrot salad is found everywhere in Israel, from holiday buffets to falafel stands. Although it is not sweet, its coin-like shape makes it just right for any Seven Blessings tray.

Note: Some people like to add lemon juice to this salad, but I prefer it without.

1 lb. carrots, sliced into ¼ in. rounds (about 6 carrots)
3 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil
1 to 2 large garlic cloves, minced or pressed
½ tsp. cumin
¼ tsp. salt
Tabasco sauce, red pepper flakes, finely minced green hot pepper to taste
2 tbsp. chopped fresh Italian parsley or cilantro
sumac, for garnish (optional)

Steam carrots in a steamer basket or in boiling salted water for 4 minutes, until tender but still brightly coloured. Drain and add olive oil, garlic, cumin, salt and Tabasco sauce while the carrots are still warm. Garnish with Italian parsley and sprinkle with sumac, if desired.

Taste and adjust seasoning and serve. (This salad may be prepared in advance and stored in a closed container in the refrigerator. Bring to room temperature, taste, adjust seasoning and serve). Serves 4 to 6.

Apple desserts help start the year off right

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

This cake is one of my personal favourites. Although there doesn't seem to be enough batter when it is assembled, it bakes up into a rich, moist cake filled with a cinnamon-laced sweet apple filling. You'll find yourself making it over and over again.

APPLE CITRUS BUNDT CAKE

Filling:
5 large tart apples
¼ cup granulated sugar
1 tbsp. cinnamon

Cake:
3 cups all-purpose flour
2 cups granulated sugar
1 tbsp. baking powder
1 tsp. salt
¼ cup vegetable oil
4 eggs
1 tbsp. finely grated lemon rind
3 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
2 tsp. finely grated orange rind
2 tbsp. fresh orange juice
2 tsp. pure vanilla

Peel, core and thinly slice apples; gently toss in bowl with sugar and cinnamon. Set aside.

In large bowl, combine flour, sugar, baking powder and salt. In separate bowl, whisk together oil, eggs, lemon rind and juice, orange rind and juice and vanilla. Make well in centre of dry ingredients; pour in wet ingredients. Using wooden spoon, stir until well combined.

Spoon ⅓ of batter into greased 10-in. tube pan. Sprinkle half of apple mixture over. Spread another third of batter over apples. Top with remaining apples and then remaining batter, spreading as much as possible (there will not be enough batter to completely cover apples; that's okay).

Bake in centre of preheated 350 oven for about 1 hour and 15 minutes or until cake springs back when lightly pressed. Let cool in pan for 30 minutes. Un-mould and serve warm or at room temperature. Makes 12 servings.

SPICED POUND CAKE WITH DRIED APPLE COMPOTE

For something just a little bit different, try this fragrant cake, topped with a white-wine-spiked syrup and macerated dried fruit. The pound cake is a bit lighter than most, which allows the spices to shine through. Use any dried fruit you wish, substituting dried pears for the apples, raisins for the apricots and dried cranberries or blueberries for the dried sour cherries.

Dried Apple Brandied Compote:
2 cups dry white wine
¼ cup honey
1 2-in. piece fresh ginger root, peeled and sliced
3 large strips lemon peel
6 whole black peppercorns
1 cinnamon stick
8 oz. dried apples, quartered (about 1¾ cup)
1 cup dried sour cherries or cranberries
¼ cup dried apricots

Holiday Food Ideas

Sweet offerings for sweet year ahead

BY NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Here are are some do-ahead desserts that are ideal for the High Holy Days. The recipes come from foodie friends who are members of the Women's Culinary Network of Toronto. We have forged strong bonds because of our mutual love of good food.

Debbie Diament owns My Place For Dinner Cooking School in Toronto, specializing in hands-on classes in world cuisines. She's a cooking instructor, recipe developer and consultant. (For more information about Diament's classes, visit www.myplacefordinner. com.)

Diament started baking this scrumptious cake when she was a student at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem in the early 1980s and it has become an all-time favourite. Anyone who's ever tasted it asks for the recipe.

Diament says, "This wonderful cake for the High Holidays guarantees rave reviews. I like using Royal Gala or Ida Red apples. The warm honey sauce makes it more elegant, but the cake is delicious on its own. The honey sauce is gilding the lily."

DEBBIE DIAMENT'S APPLE CAKE WITH WARM HONEY SAUCE

4 apples, peeled and sliced
2 cups sugar
2 eggs
½ cup canola oil
2 tsp. vanilla
2 cups flour
2 tsp. baking soda
1 tsp. salt
2 tsp. cinnamon (or 1 tsp. cinnamon, ½ tsp. cloves, ½ tsp. ground ginger)
1 cup chopped walnuts or pecans

Honey Sauce:
1 cup honey
½ cup unsalted butter
½ cup whipping cream
pinch of salt

Preheat oven to 350. Grease and flour a 10 in. bundt or 9x13-in. pan.

In a large bowl, mix apples and sugar. Add eggs, oil and vanilla to apple mixture. Blend well. Add remaining ingredients. Beat together for 4 minutes.

Pour into the bundt pan. Bake for 55 to 60 minutes. Remove from oven and let cool for at least 1 hour. Remove from pan and place on a serving platter.

For the honey sauce, combine honey, butter, cream and salt in a heavy pot. Bring to a boil, stirring occasionally, and boil for 1 minute. Serve warm over the cake. Makes 12 to 16 servings.

Spice up your pound cake

Cake:
1 2/3 cups all-purpose flour
1 1/2 tsp. ground cardamom
1/4 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. each baking soda and salt
1/2 tsp. ground ginger
1/4 tsp. ground pepper
pinch cinnamon
1/2 cup unsalted butter, softened
2 eggs
1 tsp. vanilla
1 tsp. finely grated lemon rind
2/3 cup buttermilk

Compote: In large saucepan, bring wine, 2 cups water, honey, ginger root, lemon rind, peppercorns and cinnamon stick to a boil. Boil for 10 minutes. Reduce heat and simmer for 30 minutes. Remove from heat, cover and let steep for 2 hours. Strain syrup; return to saucepan. Bring to a simmer; add apples and simmer for 10 minutes. Add sour cherries; simmer for 5 minutes. Add apricots; simmer for 5 minutes. Cool completely. Compote can be covered and refrigerated for up to 3 days.

Cake: In bowl, combine flour, cardamom, baking powder and soda, salt, ginger, pepper and cinnamon; set aside.

Using beaters, beat butter with sugar until light and fluffy. Beat in eggs, one at a time, beating well after each addition. Beat in vanilla and lemon rind. Using wooden spoon, add flour mixture in three additions, alternating with buttermilk, beginning and ending with flour mixture.

Scrape batter into greased 8x4-in. loaf pan. Bake in centre of preheated 350 oven for 45 to 50 minutes or until cake is golden and cake tester inserted in centre comes out clean. Cool on rack.

To serve, cut thick slices of pound cake and top with dried fruit, spooning a little syrup over top. Makes 8 servings.

BRANDIED APPLE AND CURRANT STRUDEL

Glorious and delicious, this sweet finale pays fine homage to the fruit of the moment, apples. The brandy and dried fruit conspire together to highlight the fruit's tart freshness, and the crispy phyllo layers highlight the sweet and succulent texture. Make the filling a day ahead to ease up on the workload of the big day.

2/3 cup dried currants
1/3 cup brandy
3 tart apples, peeled, cored and diced
1/3 cup granulated sugar
1/3 cup unsalted butter or margarine
1/3 cup crushed vanilla wafers
1/2 cup finely chopped walnuts
9 phyllo sheets

In large heavy-bottomed skillet set over medium low heat, stir together currants, half of brandy and 1/3 cup water, for about 5 minutes or until all the liquid has been absorbed.

Meanwhile, in large bowl, stir together apples, remaining brandy, sugar, and 1/3 cup water. Add to saucepan. Cook, stirring often, for about 15 minutes or until mixture is thick and apples are tender. Transfer mixture to bowl; cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate until completely chilled. (Apple mixture can be made up to 24 hours ahead.) Combine wafers and walnuts in small bowl.

Keeping remaining phyllo covered with towel and plastic wrap, place 1 piece of phyllo on work surface. Brush lightly with butter. Top with second piece of phyllo. Brush with butter; sprinkle with 3 tbsp. of wafer mixture. Repeat layering phyllo, butter and wafer crumbs, 5 more times. Top with remaining two phyllo sheets, brushing each with butter. Spoon filling down one long side of phyllo, leaving 2 inches at each of the three sides. Fold short sides over filling. Gently roll up strudel. Transfer to parchment-paper-lined baking sheet. Brush all over with butter. Using sharp knife but without cutting through to filling, score top of strudel into 6 equal-sized pieces.

Bake in centre of preheated 375 oven for 40 to 45 minutes or until golden brown. Cool; serve warm or at room temperature, slicing where original cuts were made. Makes 6 servings.

Cooks offer favorite sweets

Jocie Bussin is originally from Winnipeg and now lives in Toronto with her husband, 4 children and 2 dogs. Bussin studied cooking in Paris and graduated from culinary management at George Brown College. I'm sure you will agree that her recipe for Tarte Tatin is the perfect ending for Yom Kippur breaking of the fast.

Bussin says, "This is an adaptation of the traditional French Tarte Tatin made with apples. This dessert is delicious warm and served with vanilla ice cream. It also tastes great at room temperature. You can substitute apples for the peaches if you prefer. Either way, it is absolutely scrumptious!"

JOCIE BUSSIN'S PEACH (OR APPLE) TARTE TATIN

Pastry:
1 1/4 cups flour
6 tbsp. unsalted butter, cold and cut into small chunks
3 to 4 tbsp. ice water

Filling:
1/3 cup unsalted butter
2/3 cup sugar
3 lbs. (about 6 cups) fresh peaches (or apples), peeled and cut into thick slices

Preheat oven to 425. For the pastry: Place the flour and butter in the food processor with the metal blade attachment. Pulse until the flour has the look of tiny peas.

With the machine on, add enough water very slowly for the dough to form a ball. If the pastry is dry, add more water; if the pastry becomes sticky, add more flour.

Wrap the dough in plastic wrap until needed. If you make it ahead, remove dough from the refrigerator 30 minutes before rolling.

For the filling: In a large ovenproof skillet, melt the butter over medium heat. (Foil can be wrapped around the skillet handle if it is not ovenproof.) Then sprinkle all but 2 tbsp. sugar in the skillet. Take the pan off the heat.

On top of the sugar, arrange the peach (or apple) slices, packing them tightly and horizontally. A circular pattern may also be used. Sprinkle the remaining sugar on top of the fruit and place the pan back on the stove top on medium high heat. Cook until the sugar caramelizes and the fruit has softened, about 10 to 12 minutes.

Roll out the pastry to fit the top of the skillet. Once the fruit is cooked, take the pan off the heat and carefully place the dough on top of the fruit.

If there is any overhang of pastry, fold it gently back on top of the pastry in the pan. Place the pan in the oven for about 15 minutes, or until the crust is golden brown.

To serve, place your serving dish on top of the skillet and turn over it over carefully, so it is fruit side up on the dish. Makes 8 to 10 servings.

Last, but not least, here is my favourite recipe for old-fashioned apple cake. The recipe is from Second Helpings Please (Jewish Women International.). This recipe has special meaning for me because it was one of the first recipes I ever created.

NORENE GILLETZ'S FAVOURITE APPLE CAKE

2 eggs
1 cup sugar
1 tsp. vanilla
1/2 cup oil
3 tbsp. water or orange juice
1 1/2 cups flour
2 tsp. baking powder
1/4 tsp. salt
6 to 8 apples, pared and thinly sliced
1/2 cup white or brown sugar
2 tsp. cinnamon
1/4 cup icing sugar, if desired

Beat eggs, sugar and vanilla until fluffy. Beat in oil. Add liquid alternately with dry ingredients and beat just until smooth. Spoon half of batter into a lightly greased 9-in. square baking pan (or a 7x11-in. oblong pan). Spread evenly with a rubber spatula. Add apples that have been sprinkled with sugar and cinnamon. Cover with remaining batter. Sprinkle with icing sugar. Bake at 350 for 50 to 60 minutes, until nicely browned. Variation: Use blueberries, cherries or any desired pie filling in place of apples.

NEWS NEWS NEWS — CAROLS TIPS

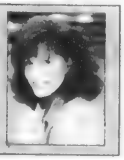
By CAROL WISE



MAKEUP: Fall makeup this season is sensational. The colours, including those for lips, eyes and nails, will knock your socks off. Myriad shades of aubergine, copper tones and oodles of metallic shades will flood the runways and inspire extraordinary, out-of-the box glamour. Lip pencils are back, with a little twist – use the same colour pencil as your lipstick and blend.

SpaMedica introduces the meeting of Restylene and Artical. What does this mean? Dr. Steve Mulhulland explains that this Dermadeep and Dermalive product has little flexible beads of acryl hydrogel and hyaluronic acid (like Restylene) – used for reducing facial lines and wrinkles – together for the first time in the same product. The hyaluronic acid gives a nice six-month shape effect, and at the end of that time, if the shape effects persist, the acrylic hydrogel itself stimulates some long-term collagen formation.

There is no collagen involved so there is no skin testing, and the carrier being hyaluronic acid means long-term correction until your own collagen takes over. Mulhulland says the most effective parts of the face to benefit from this new process are smile lines, frown lines, marionette lines, lips and the nasojugular groove. Doesn't this sound great? What a breakthrough!

SKIN CARE: Chanel introduces a fabulous new product in their Age Delay series: Age Delay Time Fighting Rejuvenation Lotion SPF 15, available in day cream and night cream. This soft, ultra-light, pink lotion combines a vitamin cocktail to protect the skin to its very core.

NARS brightening Serum is the newest addition to its wonderful skin collection. This is a fast-acting, lightweight, brightening moisturizer that will make a difference with one application and is great at fighting free radical damage.

Dior's Pure Poison. Seductive and sensual.

B. Kamins eye cream with wheat oil soothes, vitamizes and minimizes the appearance of fine lines. B. Kamins topical exfoliant for the face and neck includes glycolic 6 per cent, 8 per cent and 10 per cent. All products contain Bio-Maple compound found right here in Canada. Odd that they do not have a representative in Toronto, don't you think? Holt Renfrew, where are you? Available at www.bkamins.com.

Shiseido for men provides a new cleansing foam mousse that is great for sensitive skin.

Zirh's fragrance post-shave solution is terrific and really can sooth your man's skin after shaving.

L'Oreal Paris treats us with another great cream for aging skin. Age Perfect Double Action De-Crinkling and illuminating formula smoothes out tired features, restores radiance and skin simply looks younger.

Dior produces a miracle. In just five minutes, the promise is to provide visibly reduced wrinkles by up to 39 per cent – sounds like a plan to me.

HAIR: Jie tells us that long hair remains a large influence on the styles for fall. While spring styles involved big, bouncy, Barbie-curl looks, suggesting intriguing disconnected cuts with crimped tips, the fall will be a little more sophisticated.

Coiffured looks will remain a strong influence but with a twist (no pun intended). The twist is a secret that Jie will keep until your next visit. The incredible designer also informs us that dramatic colour remains strong for fall. While browns and ginger dominated spring colours, look for peach, apricot and plum to make a huge statement for fall. Think colour, think curls and think drama-sizzle with fall 2004. Salon Jie is located at 38 Avenue Rd. in Toronto.

The magic of fragrance from Chanel N°5

SPA: Deep pain relief remedy from Flexogan. This is an over-the-counter, topical relief cream that seems to soothe arthritic, joint and muscle pain.

Neo Strata introduces Moisture Infusion that targets and calms dry, dehydrated and red skin – especially good for aging skin.

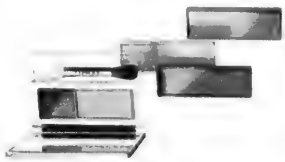
FOUNDATION: Lancôme pampers us with a great breakthrough called colour ID-Precise Match, based on the real colour of skin. This "chameleon" foundation has self-adjusting colour pigments that give it the ability to adapt and blend in with each woman's natural skin colour.

Estee Lauder's Prime FX Colour-Neutralizing Primer is a weightless makeup base that creates the appearance of a perfect complexion.

A delight from Lancaster is a Touch of Magic sparkling powder-in-puff (one shot). It has an ultra-fine violet powder held in a magnificent case with a powder puff. The powder is completely incorporated in the puff for easy application.

Clinique's Touch Base is the perfect sheer liquid glimmer for an all-over face shimmer. It is ideal for the eyes, lips and cheeks as well.



Clinique beauty products

SWEET CHEEKS:

Clinique's new touch blush is a weightless mousse that transforms into a velvety, powder-like texture. This long-lasting formula is available in both pearlized and non-pearlized finishes.

Lise Watier's Ménage a Trois powder blush is a single compact that combines three shades to create an exceptional finish, giving cheekbones an ultra-natural glow.

Caryl Baker Visage's Fall Blush in the shades of Luxe or Lavish creates a passionate effect when rubbed delicately on cheeks.

A Touch of Glamour Silky Powder Blush is so soft in texture you hardly know it is there. It offers a soft and healthy glow effect, thanks to Lancaster EYES: Chanel's Ombre d'eau fluid is a great iridescent eye shadow that can be applied for intense colour or simply a veil of shimmering light. This is just one of Chanel's limited editions.

L'Oreal Paris launches Panoramic Curl, a new mascara that both curves and separates lashes, creating a new dimension.

Shimmering Pearl eye shadow from Almay is adorable and provides a youthful glow for eyes.

MAC's fibre-rich all-black mascara is fabulous and really enhances the volume of lashes. MAC's pearled, sheer, mineralized eye shadow is brand new – a great addition for face, eyes and body.

Shiseido has lasting mascara that is a must, adding long-lasting curl that won't let up – there are eight new shades.

Estee Lauder's Pure Colour eyeliner is a luxurious liquid that goes on and stays on. Topped with Lauder's Lash XL Maximum Length Mascara, it is a real sensation.

NARS collection is filled with jewelled earth tones that emulate a desert oasis, lending intrigue to a polished perfection – available in duo or single eye shadow packs.

LIPS/NAILS: Cliniques's Cream Shaper for Lips is great. Say goodbye to lipstick that bleeds, and hello again to long-lasting lip pencil that will keep lipstick in place.

Chanel's Star Product limited edition Levres Impression de Chanel is inspired by the spongy inkpads found in Japan – much like "lip-printing." It is neither gloss nor lipstick –very intriguing.

Shiseido's five new colours in Makeup Perfecting Lipstick are complimented with Makeup Lip Liner Pencil. It's a sure hit for the ideal-for-fall's sultry lips.

Estee Lauder's new Pure Colour Lip Tint provides a sheer wash of lasting colour in one coat or can be layered for deeper intensity.

Show off your great smile with L'Oreal's Reshaping two-step lip colour that provides shine, definition and volume in 24 great shades.

MAC also provides us with a two-step liquid lipstick. Apply just enough to give lips an opaque finish, let it set for two minutes and apply a layer of Gloss Coat. The colour continues to stay on, needing only a refresher of gloss to keep lips moist.

Dior seems to be having a lot of fun with lips this season. Take a look at Dior Kiss for Lips – plumping, intense shine – very sexy. Dior Addict Ultra gloss from their Jewel Collection is magnificent in the colour A Crackle of Silver 403. It is shiny and very seductive. Dior Addict Ultra Shine sparkles like diamonds. Try the Dior contour lip pencil to sharpen definition, and don't miss the gorgeous fall nail polish – great colours.

Emergency treatment for dry skin

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

Tired, dry skin that shows signs of aging needs emergency treatment. In responding to this crisis, the Emergin C line of skincare products, from Caryl Baker Visage cosmetics can work wonders, even showing results immediately.

Formulated and manufactured in Tel Aviv, the vitamin- and botanically-enriched line can firm, tighten and renew skin that needs refreshing, even after a summer of outdoor living and sun. Caryl Baker, who founded the company 35 years ago, says the Emergin C manufacturer "uses very high quality ingredients as well as doing a lot of research and development."

They take care to produce a top quality product, even though the product promotes itself. What better promotion for such a skin-care line could there be than that it is used and touted by those whose skin is always under the microscope in the public eye! Such beautiful women as Halle Berry, Jennifer Aniston and Keri Russell all sing the praises of Emergin C products.

"Celebrities don't usually endorse a product unless they like it," Baker notes.

The multi-vitamin and retinol serum is even showcased on Halle Berry's personal website. It helps to diminish the appearance of fine lines as well as redness associated with conditions like rosacea. It is loaded with vitamins A, C, E, F, H and K that nourish the skin and aid it in healing itself. Vitamin H, or Biotin as it's more commonly known, is also found in both the night treatment and the vitality mask. This vital ingredient is essential for good cell health and growth.

This writer tried the vitamin C and retinol mask. Retinol is a derivative of vitamin A and can improve elasticity and blood circulation. Indeed, orange beads of healing retinol are visibly evident in the cream, and it provided a cool tingle while removing dead skin cells and giving my face a new lease. I likened it to an at-home spa experience.

Vitamin C, such as that found in the Emergin C vitamin C serum, also helps protect from UV rays. "We're telling people to use it under their sun block," Baker says. "It restores the vitality of the skin. The vitamin C acts as a filter for [keeping out] UVA and UVB rays."

Skin receives more benefits of vitamin C when it is applied topically than when it is taken orally, she adds.

The Emergin C line also has a complementary group of five products, including the Deglazing line for oily and problematic skin that may be prone to breakouts. The line works to clear up the problem areas without stripping and drying the skin. The mask that is part of this program contains such healing and beneficial ingredients as calamine, allantoin and colloidal sulphur, which dissolves dry dead skin cells on the surface.

Caryl Baker Visage cosmetics will soon be releasing a wonderful new product, Crease Ease, a line of relaxing gel and emulsion for the sensitive eye and lip areas.

Baker carries only quality products. Her company is the largest distributor in Canada of the Emergin C line and they carry most of the line. The Emergin C treatment line of five products generated over $1 million in sales during the first year of availability at Caryl Baker Visage salons in Canada.

So if you want to face the fall with a renewed, rejuvenated you, and the emergence of a new confidence – Emergin C will go a long way to help make that happen.

Cashmere...

Cashmere...

Cashmere sweaters – they are lovely to look at, soft to touch and feel wonderful. No wonder they never go out of style.

Knit me, a sweater label available in chain stores, specialty shops and boutiques throughout Canada, presented its first high-end cashmere line for 2004 during Montreal Fashion Week.

Here are some of the lovely styles you will see in the stores this fall.

Cashmere is a fibre of incredible finesse, known for its softness and texture. It comes from the goat of the same name (spelled kashmir). This luxurious material is made from a brushing technique rather than shearing, thus picking up only the silkiest part of the wool. This method insures a suppleness and natural look from this superior quality of fibre.

Knit me offers collections made entirely of cashmere or silk, also a high rate material, for a gracious silhouette that combines comfort and refinement.

Ginger is another line under the Rino Rossi Canada label. It is young, trendy and very in for Fall/Winter 2004-2005.

FRAGRANCE: In honour of the 10th anniversary of Cashmere Mist, Donna Karan Cosmetics is offering the most luscious layer of Cashmere to date: Pure Cashmere. As its name suggests, this fragrance is the essence of Cashmere Mist. It is intensely seductive, powerfully pure and alluringly sexy. Twelve years ago, Cashmere Mist was the scent behind Donna Karan's Body and Bath collection. Women fell in love with the scent and begged for a fragrance form. Two years later, it was available, and it has been a best seller since. This season, Pure Cashmere is being introduced in four sumptuous products: Eau de Parfum Spray, Body Oil Spray, and Solid Perfume Pendant – a must have! The pièce de résistance is the most decadent form of all, "the Perfume." It is available for a limited time at Holt Renfrew.

Kenneth Cole's new fragrance for young men is a citrus green woody experience with accents of apple and melon rind, warmed with musk and sensual sandalwood.

Lise Watier's new Dentelle fragrance for women has a soft, sensual scent with a fruity green freshness, like a burst of laughter.

Estee Lauder signs model Jon Passavant to become Estee Lauder's first Male Spokes model. His gorgeous face begins by introducing Lauder's Beyond Paradise for men. This fragrance is somewhat deceptive, evoking a blend of drenched wetness, masculine energy and sensual discovery.

Davidoff's Echo Woman is a fragrance that redefines femininity and youth. It has some very unusual ingredients like raspberry-grape granite.

Francoise Caron used classic floral notes like iris and osmanthus for romance.

Pure Poison created by Dior is seductive, very sensual with the irreverent spirit known only to Dior.

Chanel introduces three exceptional products for the bath and body enhancement – all the magic of the fragrance – through a dazzling seduction of the senses.

Lake Placid, the site of the 1932 and 1980 Winter Olympics, is home to the luxurious Mirror Lake Inn Resort and Spa.

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Located one hour from the Canadian border in New York's Adirondack National Park, on the shores of pristine Mirror Lake near the quaint shops of Lake Placid Village, the Mirror Lake Inn Spa was renovated four years ago.

It boasts "seven spacious treatment rooms for massage, body treatments and facials," says Susan Stripp, the spa's supervisor.

"We have both a men's and ladies' sanctuary, which is accented in marble and mahogany. Each sanctuary has locker facilities, a parlour area, a steam room and Jacuzzi. All are complimentary when you have a spa service. We also have a hair salon, where we also do manicures and pedicures."

The spa's staff of 25 offers a wide variety of services, including their signature treatment, the Maple Sugar Body Scrub, using products from B. Kamins of Montreal.

As well, says Stripp, the spa offers "seven different kinds of facials based on skin type, using products from both B. Kamins and Phytomer from France, which we also retail in our gift shop. Our facials include the Baby Boomer Facial for hydration, the Four-Layer Facial that helps to rebalance the skin and the Deep Cleansing Purifying Facial, which is very popular with men."

The most popular massages, she says, are the Mirror Lake Inn Custom Massage, which begins with guests lying on a European soft pack bed, and the couples Tandem Massage, where two massage therapists work on partners who lie side by side.

Boasting a Four-Diamond AAA rating, the resort offers a number of packages, including the mid-week Spa Getaway Package and the three-day Romance Package.

The resort has five separate buildings boasting 127 guest rooms and suites. Amenities include an indoor and outdoor pool, whirlpool, tennis courts and a private beach with rowboats, canoes and paddleboats. There are also guided activities offered all year round, including hiking and fishing in the warmer months and snowshoeing and cross-country skiing during the winter.

As well, there are lots of things to do and see in the area, such as skiing, golfing, or checking out the former Olympic venues around Lake Placid.

Slightly more than an hour's drive from the resort is the impressive Adirondack Museum on Blue Mountain Lake. Its 22 buildings on 32 acres, brings the area's history to life.

Less than 15 minutes from the museum is Raquette Lake, where, at the end of the 19th and the beginning of the 20th centuries, wealthy Americans such as the Huntington and Carnegie families owned property. The Raquette Lake Navigation Co. Inc. offers lunch, dinner and moonlight guided cruises aboard the W.W. Durant that takes you back in time through the Adirondack Great Camps, where the crème de la crème of society once summered.

It's a hat, hat world out there

By FRANCES GOODMAN PELLATT
Special to The CJN

One day, I turned to my son and asked him why he always wore a hat. He doffed his cap, leaned over and pointed to the top of his head, indicating the hat was to cover a thinning area on his pate.

He also mentioned that wearing a hat or cap, as he was prone to do, was "cool." It is a question of style, he said, but he also suggested that men and women may wear hats more because of what is on them than for the hat itself – referring to the trendy baseball or truckers' caps with team names and logos emblazoned on the brim for all to see.

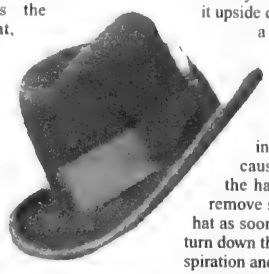
He added that he wears a cap to keep warm in cold weather, as he has discovered that if his head is warm, then so is his body. He also wears a hat to protect his head from the rays of the sun.

Although many men will start sporting headgear to cover a bald spot or receding hairline, history has shown that head coverings were worn as far back as primitive times as means of protection against the elements. However, by the 15th century, hats had become fashionable for men and were made from many different fabrics including silk, taffeta, felt, leather and beaver skins.

They also became status symbols and statements of distinction. For example, the bourgeoisie and aristocracy at one time wore formal, tall, stiff, top hats representing authority, as did those involved in professions and trades, while intellectuals, artists and country people owned soft, felt hats, which symbolized democracy and revolution.

Some popular men's styles from the 17th century, according to The Hat Site's website, included the capotain – a tall hat with medium brim and tapered crown; and the sugar loaf, with a high crown and stiff brim, which became associated with the Puritans' dress.

By the 18th century, the tricorne hat became popular and by mid-19th century the dressy top hat came into fashion, as did the coke hat that is similar to the bowler of today.



We also have our symbolic headware such as the western cowboy hat, the Mexican sombrero, the safari hat, the Jamaican wool cap, the French beret, and the French Canadian tuque to name just a few. We have every sort of head covering from fedoras in suede and leather to panamas and soft hats made from felt or straw.

Then there are all the sports teams, car/truck dealerships, racing cars and cities and countries that print or embroider their names on baseball or truckers' caps, made of plastic with vented holes or of different fabrics, to invoke support and pride, and to show team spirit by inviting people to buy and wear their particular headwear.

Some men have an assortment of hats from which to choose. They will select the exact one that will add the final touch to complement their attire: perhaps a vented truckers' cap for fishing with the guys, or a sporty corduroy baseball cap, or a leather cowboy hat to impress that certain woman. Becoming more popular is the visor cap for keeping the sun out of our eyes.

Whatever style of headwear you have, it is important to take care of your collection. Proper storage will extend the life of your hats whether they are informal caps or a more formal style.

Some tips for preserving the more expensive formal hat include: never place the brim of your hat on a flat surface but store it upside down on its crown, preferably in a hat box; always remove or pick up your hat by the brim and avoid handling the crown as much as possible; avoid handling your hat with dirty or oily hands; never leave your hat in a hot, enclosed area as this will cause the sweatband to shrink and the hat will no longer fit properly; remove surface dirt and lint from your hat as soon as possible; and occasionally turn down the sweatband to dry so that perspiration and/or hair oils will evaporate and not soak into the hat.

The less expensive baseball/truckers' caps can be preserved for longer wear by hanging them on hooks and avoiding crushing the visors. Cleaning soiled areas is also important.

A most important fact to take note of when you purchase any hat is to know the measurement of your head. Your hat size may vary depending on your hair style. It is suggested that to find out your head size, use a tape measure and measure the widest part of your head, just above the ears and eyebrows, to the nearest one-eighth of an inch.

Fall Fashion

Looking like a lady is fashionable

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

It's that time of year again, when the leaves begin to turn colour and we're back to the books Thankfully, this season is also the most important and creative time in fashion.

Fall is the time during which trends are set and the biggest fashion statements are made. This year, that creative boldness is being taken in a direction that no one ever thought possible. Yes, it's true my friends… it's time to cover up.

The fashion world has finally said "enough!" to tastelessness. For the first time in what seems to be forever, skin really isn't in.

In magazine ads and store windows, there seems to be a distinct separation between bottom and top. While hemlines have headed downtown, necklines have fled to the north, and it really doesn't seem like they're going to be meeting anytime soon.

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

But wipe those tears off your face girl – this is merely a new twist to sex appeal. The true essence of attraction lies in mystery; therefore, leaving more to the imagination always works out for the best.

Sure, flaunting your gams in a miniskirt or showing your new belly-button ring may be fun, but why give it away at first glance when being mysterious is so much more fun.

Besides, everyone knows that covering up is so much more practical during the cooler months. What's the use of worrying about your skirt flying up in the strong winds when you can be cozy, beautiful and sexy all at once in your cinched cardigan and full skirt?

With the increasing popularity of old-fashioned accessories, such as brooches and pearls, covering up doesn't seem so bad does it? Having more clothes covering your body only proves to be a bigger canvas for those jewelled wonders.

Just like the weather, you may think that the fashion world has turned on you. But this newest twist will teach you to be creative and think out of the box.

This year, go back to the way things used to be. Be a lady. Trust me, it's a lot easier than letting it all hang out.

Bright laptop totes are stylish and functional

By CARA EDELL
CJN Intern

Melissa Zalev, 23, has said "bye-bye boring, hello adoring" to laptop totes. As a fashion guru and founder of her new company, Melissa Beth Designs, Zalev has transformed what she calls "black, bulky and boring laptop cases" into "funktional and stylish" business accessories for women.

With catchy names such as Get Off My Case, Tweedy-Pie and What-a-Croc Tote, Zalev said her bags are "a bright, bold and refreshing alternative" to grandpa's suitcase.

Strong and durable, Zalev's laptop totes fit most computers. "We don't want to eliminate anyone who wants to fit theirs in," she said.

Each carrier contains a removable foam-padded compartment that can be purchased separately and transferred to any large bag. Zalev said empty totes can be filled with schoolbooks or business documents and come in handy when travelling.

"They're made with great fabrics and have really fun, printed, inside linings," she said. Velvet, felt and "mock-croc" materials in turquoise, lilac and an array of baby colours add flair to the totes.

Zalev said she came up with the idea to revolt against monotone laptop cases around March 2004. "I did a whole bunch of research and saw that there was a big void in the market. There really aren't any stylish and functional laptop bags out there. I just happened to stumble upon a really great idea and jumped right in."

Although Zalev never received formal schooling in fashion – she graduated from the University of Toronto with a triple minor in women's studies, religion and sociology – she said she has always had an interest in fashion.

During her third year at U. of T., Zalev interned in New York at an online magazine called Vivian Lives.

"That was my first real fashion experience," she said. "When I graduated, I started interning at Fashion Magazine. I've always liked fashion and hoped to pursue a career in the field."

For the past two years, Zalev has been working in the fashion industry. Before joining Wathne, an international product development company, she was part of Gangbar Winslade, which sells clothing lines such as Teenflo and Free People.

Right now, Zalev said her business is "a one woman show." She developed the concept for the bags and fashions and experimented with the products.

In turning her visions to creations, Zalev relied on Wathne's services. "I knew the quality was really great, and they are very familiar with manufacturing tote bags," she said. "I have invested some of my own money for the start-up costs. My expenses have been relatively low so far for a small business."

Zalev then contacted retailers who she thought might be interested in her label – Holt Renfrew, Los Angeles boutiques and "magazines that set the fashion trends.

"People were really excited about it, and they asked how soon they could see samples," she said. "I only sell to retailers, however, some buyers have indicated that they wish to purchase a bag at their store."

After only four months of launching Melissa Beth Designs, Zalev has already signed a deal with Holt Renfrew to sell her laptop tote Pocket Full of Puter.

Available in four colours, including orange, party pink, charcoal gray and pear green, Pocket Full of Puter is "kind of a retro-looking tote, almost like a mini-suitcase," Zalev said. It costs $198.

One of the bags in this collection has orange felt on the outside "with a great little pocket," she said, and hot-pink polka dots on the inside.

"I just contacted [Holt Renfrew] and met with the buyer and the fashion director and they thought it was really great. They placed an order as a tester for their Bloor Street location. It was history after that. But it sounds easier than it was," she said.

Turning 24 in October, Zalev said she knows she is a relatively young fashion and business entrepreneur.

"I've considered lying about my age to sound older because a lot of young people are looked at with skepticism. One of my main concerns was if people would take me seriously. But so far, I haven't had a problem."

Zalev said she hopes Melissa Beth Designs soars. "We'll see what happens. So far, there's been a lot of excitement from magazines. I've been sending them visuals. I think it will be really big."

On the last weekend in July, Zalev travelled to New York to display her wares at "Accessories, The Show." The event, which previewed different accessory lines, attracted buyers from across North America, she said.

"The show was really good. I had lots of sales and interest from retailers. We didn't make confirmed deals with any big retailers yet, because they usually want to negotiate first."

Zalev said her next big step will be going to Los Angeles to follow up with the clients she met at the show. "I want to just keep doing what I'm doing and continue selling."

While she has been accepted to do her MBA at the University of Windsor this fall, Zalev will take weekend classes so she can concentrate on her business. "I think there's so much potential in what I'm doing [with Melissa Beth Designs]. But I think this program will be a great benefit to my business," she said.

Abella appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada

The Holocaust would claim their 2½-year-old son, Julius, three of their parents and three brothers, all of whom perished at Treblinka.

When the dust settled, the couple, like thousands of other dazed survivors, found themselves in a displaced persons camp in Stuttgart, Germany. In 1946, a daughter, Rosalie, was born, followed 22 months later by another girl, Toni.

Jack Silberman's legal skills did not go to waste. The Allies asked him to develop a makeshift justice system for the DP camp, including courts and other trappings of normal life. When U.S. First Lady Eleanor Roosevelt visited the facility, Jack, as leader of the camp, was asked to make a welcoming speech, which he did in eloquent English.

Though a legitimate refugee, Jack Silberman was told he could not even apply to be a lawyer in Canada until becoming a citizen after five years and returning to law school.

Instead, he was admitted to this country in 1950 as a men's underwear cutter, and, though hard to believe, as a shepherd, both needed skills at the time.

The family, which included Fanny's mother, Zysla Krongold, settled on Oxford Street in the teeming Jewish ghetto of Kensington Market. Through Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, Jack found work in a factory as a shipper, which he hated.

While strolling one day at the intersection of Spadina and College avenues, he happened upon the Tip Top Tailors building, boldly went upstairs to the Continental Life Insurance Co. and snared a job as a salesman. He never looked back and never expressed bitterness about not being able to practise law.

Here's where Abella tends to stumble when she tells the story: Jack Silberman died two months before her graduation from the University of Toronto's law school in 1970. He never saw his daughter become a lawyer.

Abella spent the next 34 years more than making up for any gaps in her father's life, culminating in last week's announcement.

Her appointment, along with that of Madam Justice Louise Charron, will mark the first time Canada's high court will have two Jewish judges at the same time. Montreal's Morris Fish was named to the court a year ago.

Now 58, Abella has ridden the crest of a career that by any definition, has been spectacular. She has spent almost her entire adult life stoking public awareness of such as issues as employment equity (she coined the term), human rights, and inequities in family law.

Where did this fierce commitment to justice come from?

"Rosie always felt a sense of loss that our father could not practise law," recalls her sister Toni Silberman, a well-known human rights activist. "That fuelled her."

So did her precocious reading habits. When she was just nine years old, Rosalie read Victor Hugo's classic Les Miserables. "It had a profound effect on her," says her sister. "It left her with a sense of frustration at injustice in the world. She became committed to the idea that no one would ever again be falsely accused of stealing a loaf of bread."

That duty to fairness came straight from her parents.

"There was always a very strong sense of social justice that permeated our upbringing. We were both raised with a ferocious sense of idealism that change can be effected.

"Our friends' parents were also survivors and whereas they were reluctant to talk about what they had gone through, our parents shared everything with us on a right-to-know basis," recalled Silberman.

"They shed many tears as they spoke, and so did we. But it was their stories of optimism and joy at having survived and living in Canada that informed and directed our lives."

The girls' mother "was the original women's libber, a strong dynamic woman for whom nothing was impossible." Fanny Silberman is now 87 and retired from a successful real estate career that she took up after her husband's death.

Both girls played piano and had to practise two hours a day – classics only. Rosalie graduated from the Royal Conservatory of Music and the sisters played at numerous music festivals both separately and together on the same piano. Once, they played Massey Hall.

Today, Abella is noted for her love of George Gershwin and Broadway show tunes.

"Rosie was my icebreaker, my template. If it worked for her, I was allowed to do it," her sister says.

Abella did the obligatory backpacking through Europe alone at age 19, ending up in Israel. Later that year, she met a young doctoral student in history while both were working at an international teach-in. In 1968, she married Irving Abella, who later became a noted historian. The couple has two sons, Jacob and Zachary, both lawyers.

She practised civil and criminal litigation for five years until age 29, when she was appointed as a judge to the Ontario Family Court, as it was then known. She made history by becoming Canada's youngest – and first pregnant – judge.

Anti-semitic graffiti found near Calgary Jewish Centre

By BARBARA BALFOUR
Special to The CJN

CALGARY — Two incidents of anti-Semitic graffiti in Calgary last month left the local Jewish community reeling.

In the more recent case, parts of a six-foot-high fence around a condominium complex near the Calgary Jewish Centre were spray-painted with black swastikas and the words, "Jews, go home."

The graffiti was found on 90th Avenue S.W., in the Pumphill area, where a sizeable number of Jews live. Police believe the vandalism occurred overnight on Aug. 22.

To date, there are no suspects.

Const. Doug Jones, hate/bias crime co-ordinator for the Calgary police, said such incidents have happened before, but not recently.

"It could be possible that a couple of young people who didn't know the impact of such a crime did this, or it could be someone who has a serious grudge against the community," he said.

"This is being treated as a hate crime and as such is subject to a serious investigation."

While the graffiti was painted over by a vandalism task force the next day, people drove by the graffiti the morning of Aug. 23, and it was highly visible from a distance, said Nelson Halpern, president of the Calgary Jewish Community Council.

"Holocaust survivors were very agitated by it – they live in the area and have to walk or drive by it, so it forces a recurrence of bad memories," he said.

The other incident occurred close to a gas station in the city's north end two weeks prior to the Pumphill vandalism. A stencil was used to create a multi-coloured caricature of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, depicted as a Nazi with two SS bolts going through him.

Although they didn't see the Pumphill area graffiti, Holocaust survivors Sidney Cyngiser, 80, said he and his wife Bronia, 72, were emotionally affected by it.

"People have died defending our right to democracy and to live next to one another in peace," Sidney said.

"How can someone hate that much? I've been through hell and I don't hate."

Judge known for report on employment equity

During 11 years on the bench, she chaired the Ontario Labour Relations Board, the Ontario Law Reform Commission, and a provincial study on access to legal services by the disabled.

She was also a member of the Ontario Human Rights Commission, the Premier's Advisory Committee on Confederation, the Ontario Public Service Labour Relations Tribunal, and the Canadian Judicial Council's inquiry on Donald Marshall Jr.

But Abella is perhaps best known for her work on a 1984 federal royal commission on equality in employment. The groundbreaking theories of equity and discrimination as applied to women, native people, visible minorities and the disabled that she developed in her final report have served as models for legislation in New Zealand, South Africa and Northern Ireland.

They were also adopted by the Supreme Court of Canada, which issued its first equality rights ruling in 1989.

After leaving the court in 1987, she taught for four years at McGill University and for three at her alma mater U of T, specializing in constitutional law, human rights, civil liberties and the judiciary's role in a democracy.

In addition, she moderated the televised leaders' debate in the 1988 federal election and co-chaired the 1992 constitutional conferences held across Canada

She has written more than 70 professional articles and authored or co-edited four books on a variety of legal topics. She has 20 honorary degrees, and has been awarded numerous prizes.

In 1992, she was appointed to the Ontario Court of Appeal.

Abella has also found time to be a judge of the Giller Literary Prize, Canada's richest writing award.

In the Jewish community, her latest achievement won't go unrecognized. During the coming High Holy Days, she will receive an aliyah at the Abellas' synagogue, Beth Tzedec Congregation.

In the words of the synagogue's spiritual leader, Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, "a great jurist knows that all law comes from the Torah."

CJC gets intervener status in Rwanda case

CJN News Services

Canadian Jewish Congress has been granted intervener status in the case of Leon Mugesera, who allegedly delivered a speech in Rwanda in 1992 that incited hatred, murder and genocide.

The Ministry of Citizenship and Immigration is contesting Mugesera's application for residence because of the alleged speech, which he allegedly misrepresented on his residence application form.

CJC is partnering with Human Rights Watch and the University of Toronto faculty of law's international human rights clinic in the case.

"CJC has strong feelings of empathy with the Rwandan community as fellow victims and survivors of genocide," said Manuel Prutschi, CJC's interim national executive director.

"We wanted to participate to ensure that those involved in any way in perpetrating the atrocities which took place in Rwanda are brought to justice and are prevented from entering and remaining in Canada."

Over the years, Ethiopia has been supportive of Israel

or not, legend or real, the Ark draws us, like so many others, as close as possible to its charms.

In Ethiopia, where literacy rates are low and news spreads around family fires, where legends turn into hard fact as fast as barley ferments into local brew, Thomas tells us that Israelis recently tried to capture the Ark of the Covenant but were repelled by the Ethiopian police.

It is a story that we also hear in the eastern part of the country, where the presence of Ethiopian Orthodox churches gives way to the madrasas and mosques that freckle the countryside. Close to the Somali border, the walled city of Harrar, a city-state in the nine regional states that make up Ethiopia's federalist government, contains more than 87 mosques in an area of just over one square mile. In one of those mosques, a newsletter reporting that Israeli commandos had invaded Aksum and attempted to make off with the Ark of the Covenant had been circulated.

And so another legend is born. But this one is meant to drive a wedge between the Ethiopians and their traditional friendship with Israel.

Over the years, Ethiopia has been supportive of Israel, despite a 15-year break in relations from 1973 to '89, during the Derg era and Colonel Mengistu Haile Mariam's Marxist regime. Today, a local resident tells us that if Israel were to go to war and ask for help, they would probably have two million volunteers lined up outside the Israeli embassy in Addis Ababa.

Yet, Amare Aregawi, the editor in chief of The Reporter, an English-language weekly newspaper, said that "Israelis can't continue to simply take Ethiopian support for granted.

"Ethiopia is surrounded by Muslim countries and the Arab world is spending a lot of money building ties with the Ethiopian leadership as well as with its people. Within the last 13 years, over 56 mosques have opened up," Aregawi says.

He has just returned from a day in court defending his paper against a libel suit launched against him by the government. The intellectual dissident argues that the only way to control the spread of misinformation is by democratizing the government, creating an unbiased court system and encouraging a free press.

"Ethiopia is vulnerable to terrorist influence when the people are hungry and the financial system is corrupt," Aregawi warns.

"And then it is very easy for Africans to fall into the trap of criticizing Israel rather than looking at their own problems."

There are reasons for Ethiopians to feel betrayed by the West and the international press. Some feel that the world has turned its back on the state of affairs in their country and the huge divide between wealthy and poor. Others complain that despite the millions of donated dollars, the poor see little improvement in their living conditions.

"The government has been in power for more than 13 years and the first four years were very good. But just like [President Thabo] Mbeki can't keep comparing its [South Africa's] government to South Africa's apartheid era, the Ethiopian government can't keep comparing itself to the Derg," Aregawi says.

Although three of Mosesson's children now live in Israel, his grocery stores and wife keep him in Ethiopia, where, from time to time, he meets with Israeli business people who come to buy local produce for export.

"Ethiopia changed a great deal after Haile Selassie's reign," Mosesson explains.

Emperor Haile Selassie was crowned as regent on November 2, 1930, and ruled Ethiopia as imperial ruler until he was overthrown by the Derg in 1974.

During the Derg regime, Ethiopia transformed from an "elitist hierarchical structure to an oppressive communist regime that left Ethiopians with a sense that everything belongs to them," Mosesson says.

"The situation now in Ethiopia is very complex," he adds with a shrug.

And face-saving is a big part of the equation. Ethiopia is a country where Haile Selassie, who claimed to be a direct descendent of King Solomon, is cursed as a tyrant but venerated as a near God; where there were deep cultural roots between Judaism and the local Old Testament based Christianity, yet the Ethiopian Jews were treated with disdain until they left; where the World Health Organization has set up HIV clinics in virtually every village, yet everyone tells you that AIDS isn't really an issue.

As we leave Mosesson's shop, our guide takes us out of Addis and on to the road leading east through the Arber-Guger mountains. With great pride, he points out pipes being laid alongside the highway. The hope is that improved water systems will prevent the recurring famines that have historically plagued the Horn of Africa.

Along the way, we pass through checkpoints, see armed soldiers protecting bridges on the highway that leads to Ethiopia's only port access in Djibouti and wonder about farmers and herdsmen with rifles slung over their shoulders.

"What are the soldiers looking for? Why are the men carrying rifles? Is terrorism an issue here?" I ask.

The answer I usually get is typical of people who don't want to confront their own challenges.

"Don't worry," the guide responds, "there are no problems here."

YOU CAN'T PUT A BANDAGE ON TERRORISM

But you can help us try to stop the bleeding.

Within seconds, a terrorist strike in Jerusalem can cause devastating losses and massive injuries. Within minutes, victims arrive at the Shaare Zedek Medical Center. Shaare Zedek is overburdened by growing demand for its life-saving emergency care. A new 32,300 square foot Emergency Department, opening this year, will become Jerusalem's premier emergency facility. But equipment costs and other critical needs still outweigh the resources.

You can't put a bandage on terrorism. But you can help us save lives.

50TH ANNIVERSARY
TEMPLE SINAI
CONGREGATION OF TORONTO

Join us for a dialogue with David Baker

Senior Foreign Press Coordinator, The Prime Minister's Office, Jerusalem
Thursday September 9, 2004 at 7.45 p.m.

David Baker works daily with media such as CNN, CBC, and the New York Times from his post in the Prime Minister's office in Jerusalem. He will address critical issues in communicating to the world press in a media emergency-related environment. Questions from the audience will be welcome.

This special program is made possible by the Mizrahi Family, in memory of Gaston & Racheline (Lynn) Mizrahi, who loved the Jewish people, Israel, and the pursuit of ideas.

Jennifer Mizrahi, of Washington D.C., herself a noted media consultant and founder of the Israel Project, will serve as moderator.

Temple Sinai's Israel Committee invites the community to attend this 50th Anniversary program at 210 Wilson Avenue, Toronto

The Vanished World of Polish Jews: A Celebration of Jewish Life in Pre-War Poland, Captured in Photographs

"Those in the photographs do not yet know that soon their houses will be deserted, the streets of their towns covered with black snow and fluff from slit eiderdowns. The wisdom of the Book will be able to save no one. All that will remain after them, when the biblical names have left in cattle cars, could be put in a drawer, hidden in the attic, buried in junk."

Montreal bids farewell to Israeli ambassador

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The biggest threat to Israel today is not the ongoing Palestinian intifadah, but the possibility that Iran will become a nuclear power, outgoing Israeli ambassador Haim Divon said at a farewell reception for him hosted by FEDERATION CJA.

"While the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is difficult, it is manageable. It does not have an existential dimension. The real threat is Iran going nuclear. I'm glad the government of Canada sees eye-to-eye with us on that. It realizes that this is also a threat to the entire free world," said Divon, who will be returning to Israel shortly after four years in Ottawa.

He said he was struck by the Montreal Jewish community's refusal to be intimidated by acts of anti-Semitism.

"I can't forget visiting United Talmud Torahs [after the firebombing of one of its libraries in April]. I thought I would see young kids frightened. But what I saw were resilient, happy kids, almost as if nothing had happened.

"I was strengthened by that. They could feel the leadership of the community."

The support voiced by all levels of government after the incident, he said, is an indication of "the respect you, as a community, have created in Canada."

Divon thanked the Jewish community for its eagerness to actively support Israel, especially in the face of terrorism. "We were fortunate to work with you."

Federation president Sylvain Abitbol praised Divon for his leadership during a difficult period for Israel. "You responded with grace and dignity under fire," he said.

Abitbol pledged that the Montreal Jewish community will "always take its rightful place beside Israel.

"This a is battle for public opinion. We must explain to our leaders that Israel shares the same values of life, democracy and free expression."

Quebec-Israel Committee (QIC) president Michael Frankel said Divon was helpful in the organization's effort to make Israel's case in the province. The ambassador's daughter, Joli Divon, is working at the QIC and previously was in the federation's Israel and overseas department.

Jeff Boro, Canadian Jewish Congress' Quebec region president, said Divon "spoke out when it was time to speak out… You have allowed us to be proud when we speak out for the State of Israel."

He also congratulated Divon's daughter for engaging in dialogue with a Muslim peace group while living in Montreal.

State of Israel Bonds Montreal co-chair Ora Stolovitz said Divon brought an "uplifting message that we stand as one people whose spiritual heart will always be Eretz Israel."

Jewish National Fund Montreal president Annette Goldman also thanked Divon for his support, while Arlazar Eliashiv, president of the Canadian Zionist Federation, Eastern region, said he would take Divon up on his offer that the ambassador will play golf when Israel is at peace.

As a memento, the federation made a donation in Divon's name to the Trans-Canada Foundation, which is aiming to build a cross-country hiking and cycling trail and is a favourite project of philanthropist Stephen Bronfman.

Yiddish CD a chance to 'give back to my own people'

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to the CJN

A life filled with music. That describes Neil Sedaka's journey from classically trained pianist to chart-topping star and concert performer, then back to his roots with his new and hot-selling CD Brighton Beach Memories: Neil Sedaka Sings Yiddish.

That covers a lot of ground, but Sedaka has done it all. He has been successful in every field of music he has tried. Not only has he been a best-selling singer, his compositions have been recorded by such stars as Elvis Presley, Andy Williams, the Captain & Tennille, Sheryl Crow and Mandy Moore, to name a few.

Sedaka, who will be performing twice this week at Casino Rama in Orillia (on Sept. 2 and 3), told The CJN that the Yiddish CD was inspired by memories of his childhood, when "he listened to a lot of Yiddish music," and by the pleasure he always got from hearing and singing those songs.

He said he recorded the CD mainly "for his family and friends," but was asked by Sameach Music, a company specializing in Jewish recordings, to allow it to distribute the CD to synagogues and Jewish organizations. At times, the album has also ranked among the top 10 sellers on Amazon.com.

He's been very pleased with the success of Brighton Beach Memories CD, he said, because the CD gives him an opportunity "to preserve these songs" and go back to "my roots… and give back to my own people."

Sedaka has performed in a number of recent charity concerts that featured his Yiddish material and has raised hundreds of thousands of dollars for Jewish causes.

He said he grew up in a Jewish family that was "not religious, but spiritual and observed the Jewish customs and traditions." He and Leba Strassberg, his wife of 43 years, have a grown son and daughter, as well as 18-month old twin granddaughters.

Sedaka's musical talent showed itself at an early age when he began studying the piano at the world-renowned Juilliard School of Music. By the time he was in his teens, he was being touted by such prominent classical musicians as Artur Rubinstein.

But popular music proved to be a powerful magnet for the young Sedaka and he began writing songs in collaboration with a neighbour, Howard Greenfield. They hit the big time when Connie Francis recorded their song Stupid Cupid a short time later.

Asked in a phone interview why he gave up his classical studies, Sedaka said, "It proved much more rewarding to go around the world doing my own music."

Neil Sedaka

After a period in the late 1950s and early 1960s when he recorded hit after hit, Sedaka's popularity dwindled as the music scene underwent revolutionary changes with the arrival of the Beatles, Bob Dylan and other musical styles.

But Sedaka kept working, writing numerous hits for other vocalists, then making a comeback in the 1970s with such hits as Bad Blood, Laughter In The Rain and a new version of Breaking Up Is Hard To Do.

Although times have changed and musical styles have gone in and out of fashion, Sedaka has continued to write and perform. As he put it, he "enjoys performing in front of people… the adrenaline rush is very invigorating."

Sedaka said his concert audiences run the gamut from people who danced to his music in the 1950s to young people "who like to listen to oldies and want to hear melodic music."

He currently has several CDs out, including Classically Sedaka, with songs based on classical music. Another, The Show Goes On, features all-new material and By Popular Demand has a mixture of his classic pop songs and some more recent compositions.

Sedaka recently appeared as a celebrity judge on the popular television show, American Idol, and Idol runner-up Clay Aiken topped the charts with his recording of Sedaka's song Solitaire.

Although his golden oldies will be front and centre at his Casino Rama concerts, he said, we may also get a chance to hear one or two Yiddish songs.

Sedaka's recent CDs, including Brighton Beach Memories, can be purchased online at www.neilsedaka.com or www.amazon.com.

Sudanese refugee thanks Jews for support

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – A Sudanese refugee, now living in the United States, thanked the Jewish community for standing "shoulder to shoulder" with his people in their current crisis.

"Why are the Jewish people one of our few friends in the world?" asked James Morgan at an interfaith rally organized by the Canadian Action Committee for Darfur, in collaboration with Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec Region.

"Because they are survivors of the Holocaust, who support all human beings who suffer... and feel a duty to protect human rights in the world," said Morgan, a Christian who survived an earlier attempt to "eliminate" the black African population in southern Sudan in the early 1990s.

The current crisis in the Darfur region is worse because it is such a remote desert part of the country, and not easily accessible to the media or other outside observers, he said.

Morgan stressed that Arab militiamen, known as the Janjaweed, have been systematically killing, starving, raping and forcing hundreds of thousands to flee Sudan on orders from the government, which, he said, has a plan to exterminate the black race and non-Muslims. He insisted that the conflict is not a suppression of rebellion or tribal warfare.

"Sudan has a longtime policy of making it an Arab, Islamic nation... and is arming and supplying the Janjaweed," he said at the mid-afternoon rally held in downtown Raoul Wallenberg Square, behind the Anglican Christ Church Cathedral.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko of Congregation Beth Israel-Beth Aaron insisted that what is happening is "absolute genocide... This is not about wild gangs out of control. This is a government operation to Arabize a black land, a deliberate political effort... It's that simple and grotesquely evil."

He suggested the West is not taking the Sudanese situation as seriously as it should because of underlying prejudice.

"We read about events in Africa like it is some foreign planet that has nothing to do with us... But there is nothing that distinguishes me from James Morgan than an accident of birth," Rabbi Poupko said.

He said aid is not enough and that an international peacekeeping force should be sent to Sudan.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz, president of the Rabbinical Council of Canada, regretted the low turnout at the rally, indicating that may be a result of what he feels is the media's downplaying of the Sudan crisis. "We can all do something by telling our leaders 'enough.' Let's not look back with guilt years from now because we did not stand up."

CJC Quebec Region president Jeffrey Boro said it is "well-documented that the Sudanese government supports the atrocities carried out by the Janjaweed... The complicity of the government is omnipresent."

He said it is an "obscenity" that Sudan continues to sit as part of a four-nation African group on the United Nations Human Rights Commission.

He said 600 are dying each day in Sudan and warned the total could reach one million if urgent action is not taken.

"Genocide is again occurring as the world watches," he said. "As a child, I wondered why no one did anything to stop the Holocaust. Now I find myself hearing echoes of the same question. The world community can't fail again."

Rev. Darryl Gray, of the Union United Church and a black community leader, called on the Canadian government to press for an immediate UN commission of inquiry into this "genocide."

"We can't wait for a legal determination of genocide before we act... Let's call it what it is."

"If Darfur was in Europe we would not be talking; we would be acting. Are we taking time to study the situation because it is in Africa?"

The churches, he said, also must not "stand by silent while the murderers annihilate a whole people."

A scene from Amos Gitai's Promised Land

Number of films from Israel

Part thriller and part family drama, Walk on Water examines the dark undercurrents of Germany's Nazi past and one Jew's confrontation with its fallout.

Promised Land, by the prolific director Amos Gitai (Kadosh, Kippur and Kedma, among others), turns on a prostitution ring that smuggles eastern European women into Israel.

For them, Israel is not quite the Land of Milk and Honey as they are hustled around the country like so many head of cattle.

The film sparkles with glimmers of humanity, and in a cameo appearance, the great German actress Hanna Schygulla turns in a stellar performance.

Private, an Italian film in Arabic, Hebrew and English, looks at the Arab-Israeli conflict through the eyes of a middle-class Arab family directly caught up in the current Palestinian uprising.

Directed by Saverio Costanzo, it is about a group of Israeli soldiers who use their home as an observation point during a military operation to flush out terrorists.

The Ninth Day, a German film by Volker Schlondorff, is based on a true story and is about a young Catholic priest who is arrested and shipped to the Dachau concentration camp.

Released on a nine-day leave, the priest is forced by an SS officer to make a morally agonizing decision.

Whisky is an unconventional comedy from Argentina about a reserved Jewish sock factory owner who renews his relationship with his Brazilian brother after their mother dies. Juan Pablo Rebella and Pablo Stoll direct.

Whisky is being shown in conjunction with Federico Veiroj's short As Follows, which depicts the rite of passage of a bar mitzvah boy and the surprise his father has in store for him.

In Land of Plenty, by Wim Wenders, a young woman returns to the United States after years of living in Israel.

Lana (Michelle Williams) searches for her only living relative, her uncle Paul (John Diehl), a paranoid Green Beret veteran obsessed with national security in the wake of 9/11.

Isn't This a Time! A Tribute Concert for Harold Leventhal focuses on Leventhal, a seasoned and beloved American folk music supporter who promoted the careers of such luminaries as Pete Seeger, Theodore Bikel and Peter, Paul and Mary. In the highwater mark of the film, they sing their signature songs.

Elliott Smelliot, directed by Anita Doron of Toronto, is a romantic comedy about a 12-year-old Jewish genius who falls in love with an alluring older student.

German thriller portrays Hitler with degree of sympathy

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

One of the most anticipated and perhaps controversial movies at this year's Toronto International Film Festival will be Oliver Hirschbiegel's Downfall (Der Untergang), an intense thriller from Germany about the last 12 desperate days of Adolf Hitler's life in his Berlin bunker at the close of World War II.

Starring the charismatic Swiss actor Bruno Ganz as the strangely alluring Hitler, the film portrays the Nazi dictator in a somewhat humanistic light at times.

According to press materials for the film, which is making its world premier at the festival, Ganz "manages the impossible by simultaneously eliciting empathy and disgust through his mesmerizing performance."

Written and produced by Bernd Eichinger, Downfall is a hybrid.

Based on Joachim Fest's landmark account of Hitler's final hours, it unfolds through the viewpoint of his faithful and naive personal secretary, Traudl Junge, the subject of a fairly recent documentary. She died last year after writing her memoirs.

Among the characters who flit through Downfall are Hitler's mistress Eva Braun (Juliane Kohler) and his minister of propaganda Joseph Goebbels (Ulrich Mattes).

Downfall, which refers to the Holocaust only briefly, has come under scrutiny in Germany for its portrayal of Hitler.

The Berlin daily Der Tagesspiegel commented, "This Hitler, who is so nice to the female bunker staff while he sends a whole people to the slaughter outside, does indeed keep awakening sympathy."

Meanwhile, Frankfurter Allgemeine Sonntagszeitung noted, "Downfall prompts the question whether one should be allowed to feel sympathy for Hitler."

Eichinger, the producer of The Name of the Rose, suggested in an interview with the ZDF television network that a balanced portrayal of Hitler was unavoidable.

"If you want to understand history, you have to understand the people that make it," he said.

Future teachers learn to experience community

By ALIZA LIBMAN
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

When you type the term "Jewish education" into the Internet search engine Google, the first organization to pop up is CAJE, the Coalition for the Advancement of Jewish Education. As a CAJE member for my entire college career, this makes me very proud. But when CAJE executive members tell me that half of North American teachers will retire in the next decade or so, this makes me very nervous.

It raises the question: Who will teach the students of the future? The answer seems perfectly clear.

Me.

Well, not just me, but sometimes it feels that way. Too often, people tell me I'm too smart to "waste my brain" by becoming a teacher. I think I'd be wasting my heart if I didn't.

So when CAJE sent me a mailing about the Schusterman College Program (SCP), which would be held at its annual Conference on Alternative Jewish Education (also known as CAJE), I jumped at the opportunity to go.

In the Schusterman program, I met people who thought differently, acted differently, taught differently and defined "Jewish education" differently than I do. But our shared passion was what we all brought to the table.

A primary goal of the 26-student program was for us to work and talk together and experience community.

"This program seeks to unite the totality of klal Yisrael," said participant Michael Fel. "Rather than focusing on our differences, we focused on the similarities." Michael, a Hispanic Jew, introduced himself to the group as being from "the voting-impaired city of Miami."

Michael was the first Argentine Jew I'd ever met, and judging from everyone's reactions to my saying "kilometre" and "eh?" they hadn't met too many Canadians.

Talking after the program ended, third-year Columbia University student Mara Berde said "it was my first real experience in a pluralistic environment."

Pluralism means different things to different people. To some conference participants, pluralism means that we should accept the validity of other religious denominations as well as our own.

To keynote speaker Richard Joel, former director of Hillel International and current president of Yeshiva University, "pluralism means I am prepared to honour your right to be wrong."

To me, it's about how we accommodate people who are different from us. It's about asking ourselves whether prayer services will have separate or mixed seating, or whether sing-a-long kumsitzes on Friday night will or will not be accompanied by musical instruments.

One participant expressed dismay because she found out the graduate school she was planning to attend does not accept openly gay students. During our "think tank," where we shared lesson plans on Jewish topics, we explored this topic as we pondered teaching Jewish responses to homosexuality. We also contemplated how to teach about Jewish identity, Jewish music, Jews for Jesus and cults in classrooms, youth groups and at camps.

We grappled with the question of how to maintain tradition in a world rocked by change.

I answered that question for myself while searching for ways to use drama in my Torah classes. I attended drama workshops, bought drama books and wondered whether re-enacting the splitting of the Red Sea would make my students relate to it as a piece of their history. I was lucky that conference organizers had invited a representative of Storahtelling, a non-profit group that injects drama and storytelling into ritual services such as the Shabbat Torah reading.

"It's important to bring life to such an important part of Jewish ritual," said SCP co-chair and Jewish Theological Seminary student Lauren Twigg, who was attending her third conference. "The Torah is read every week, over and over again. Most of the time people zone out and don't pay attention."

As students of Jewish education, we find it easy to get discouraged. We feel the com-

"The Passion of the Jews"

The Passion of the Jews - Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz wrote that "Passion is a luxury our community cannot afford to be without". The negative fallout of Jewish homes and institutions that lack passion is painfully evident in the growing number of Jews who don't find Judaism stimulating and the alarming phenomenon of Jews seeking vibrant spirituality in other faiths.

This program explores the importance of cultivating a passionate Jewish life and different approaches to achieving this at home, in our synagogues, and in the broader Jewish community.

Passion for Jewish education remains alive

munity is zoning us out. We think no one is paying attention. But that sentiment is wrong, I learned at the conference.

The truth is, the passion I feel for Jewish education is alive in other people, too. It's alive in the 1,400-plus people who came to the conference this year. It's alive in the 26 SCP students who vowed to attend again next year. It's alive in Lynn Schusterman and the Schusterman Foundation, who believe that education is so important that they fund our program.

The secret of Jewish education, of course, is that the material – the texts, the information – is not enough. There has to be something more, something that makes parents pay tens of thousands of dollars in tuition and drag their kids to Hebrew school day after day, or at 9 a.m. on a Sunday.

That something means I am charged with much more than teaching words on a page. I am charged with teaching students – Jewish souls who are holy no matter what their nationality, sexual orientation, ability or disability. And I define success by smiling and soul-searching, not dollars and cents.

So I'm glad that when searching for Jewish education, I found CAJE.

Aliza Libman is a fourth-year education student at York University. She attended her first Conference on Alternative Jewish Education last month.

אולימפיאדת אתנה

בטור הקודם לא הספיק המקום למספר סרטי חובה, שאני יודע שיחקנו אתכם תמיד מרובה. סיינתי החונה סרטים בינוניים או ככה ככה. אז הינה:

Note book הוא סיפור חייהם של שני אוהבים כפי שהוא משתקף כשהם זקנים. אינני רוצה לגלות יותר מידי-אבל יש בסרט הפתעה מאוד משמעותית שעושה אותו מיוחד מאוד. שמותה בסולם קורן.

The Door in the Floor הוא סיפור קשיחם של בני זוג נשוי בעקבות תאונה טראגית שבה נהרגו שני ילדיהם. קים בייסינגר, שתמיד עשתה תפקידים במשבצת של הַיְפִיפִיָה עושה פה תפקיד נפלא של אישה מתבגרת, מה שמראה שגם לְשָׁאפוֹת יש עתיד בתום כחותנן הַיְפִיפִיָה. תשע בסולם קורן.

Facing Windows הוא סרט איטלקי מדהים בשלמותו, על זוג צעיר שמכניס לביתו איש זקן ועירידי ששכח מיהו. לצד סיפור זה, מתנהל בסרט סיפור נוסף, על אחבה גדולה בין גבר ואישה שחלונות דיוותיהם משקיפים זה לכוון זה. עשר בסולם קורן.

Since Otar Left הוא סרט גרוזיני נוגע ללב ועשוי שגעון שדובר צרפתית וגרוזינית. סיפורן של אישה זקנה, ביתה ונכדתה שמחכות לאוטר, חבן, תאח, חדוד, רופא במקצועו שנסע לעבוד כפועל בניין בלתי חוקי בפאריז. במרכז הסרט, מעבר לעלילה, עומד חשקר תגדול של לכסות את האמת כדי לא לפגוע באלה שאוהבים. משחק מצויין של וקנה בת תשעים: תשע בסולם קורן.

A Home at the End of the World הוא סרט אמריקאי באיכויות אידיוסינקרטיות (דבר נדיר לכשעצמו) . סיפור משולש אחבה בין שני גברים ואשה. למרות העלילה העצובה לעיתים, עם סיפור חיים קשה-יש בסרט אנרגיה חיובית וחרגשה נחדרת. שוחה מאוד לראות איך גישה חיובית עושה את החיים שונים. תשע בסולם קורן.

עוד שנה כמעט חלפה, ומגיעה שעת החתכנסות, חמחשבה העמוקה, החשתקפות על מה שחיה ומה שיחיה. או כמילותיו של נתן יונתן:

שירים עוד כאן, ניתנה לנו ארכה,
עד שהזמן שלנו יעבור,
חיו זמנים קאור, מה עוד אפשר לרצות,
יפים ממני ומסוך האחרונה לקוחה.

שיחיו לכם שנה טובה וגמר חתימה טובה ממני, גידי.

AIPAC spy allegations shake pro-Israel lobby

By MATTHEW E. BERGER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Allegations that a Pentagon official passed documents to Israel through a pro-Israel lobbying group have shaken Washington and drawn intense attention to the close relationship between the Bush administration and the Jewish state.

Reports surfaced last Friday that a U.S. Defence Department official was being investigated by the FBI for passing secrets to Israel, and two staffers at the American Israel Public Affairs Committee are accused of serving as intermediaries, receiving the documents from the Pentagon aide and passing them to the Israelis.

Media reports have identified the Pentagon employee as Larry Franklin, but the AIPAC staffers have not been named. Israeli officials and AIPAC both denied the allegations, and Pentagon officials said they believed the investigation was limited in its scope.

The allegations, first reported by CBS News, came just days before Republicans and AIPAC leaders were expected to tout close ties between the United States and Israel at the Republican National Convention in New York.

But the suspicion that Israeli officials gained access to classified information could hurt the close co-ordination the two countries officially share and make U.S. governmental officials wary of dealing with Israeli representatives.

If found true, the allegations could harm the reputation of AIPAC, considered the most successful foreign policy lobbying group in Washington, with numerous advocates in Congress and in the American Jewish community.

Jewish officials were downplaying the story Sunday, standing behind AIPAC and suggesting that business at the Republican convention would proceed as normal, with more than a dozen Republican legislators and party leaders expected to address closed-door AIPAC forums.

Other lawmakers and Jewish leaders were contacting AIPAC staff to find out how they could help or express support.

"All of us will go on with our business," said Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations. "There is no change because of this story, and we should wait to see what happens in the coming days."

The charges evoked memories of Jonathan Pollard, the American Jew and former Navy intelligence officer who was sentenced to life in prison in 1987 for spying for Israel.

While some American Jewish leaders now work to free Pollard, his spying for the Jewish state temporarily strained relations between the allies. It also placed Jewish officials in the United States government under the microscope for suspicions of dual loyalty.

Franklin is not Jewish, however, and no motive for his alleged actions has been presented.

Israeli sources said Saturday that Franklin's work relations with Israeli officials did not exceed the boundaries of accepted diplomatic contact, Ha'aretz reported. The sources said checks conducted over the weekend negated all possibility of espionage or unacceptable conduct and that no Israeli had received classified information from Franklin.

Because of the impact the Pollard case had on U.S.-Israeli relations, Israel made a deep strategic decision afterward not to spy in the United States, Israeli officials told JTA.

No arrests in the investigation have been made, but according to the CBS report, the FBI has wiretaps, undercover surveillance and photography that show the exchange of a classified document about the formulation of Bush administration policy for Iran.

Israel has grown increasingly concerned about Iran, with officials saying the country is a larger threat to the Jewish state than the former Iraqi regime of Saddam Hussein. Israel has stressed the threat Iran's nuclear weapons program poses to Mideast stability.

Franklin is a desk officer on Iran in the Pentagon's Near East and South Asia bureau. The division is overseen by Douglas Feith, the undersecretary of defence for policy, who was considered a strong advocate for the Iraq war.

Feith also was one of several Jewish "neo-conservatives" inside the government whom war critics have sought to portray as instigating the war in Iraq.

Sources inside and outside the administration said Franklin is a career official who is close to retirement and not considered a main architect of policy within the office.

According to media reports, some federal officials have suggested that the charges against Franklin may not rise to espionage, and rather may be limited to mishandling or improper use of classified materials, a more common charge.

Federal officials, who have been investigating this case for more than a year, suggest arrests could come as early as next week. It's unclear whether any AIPAC staffers could also be charged. The group says it has made information available to federal investigators, and staff members have been interviewed.

"Any allegation of criminal conduct by AIPAC or our employees is false and baseless," the pro-Israel lobby said in a statement Friday. "Neither AIPAC nor any of its employees has violated any laws or rules, nor has AIPAC or its employees ever received information they believed was secret or classified."

Israel's minister for Diaspora affairs, Natan Sharansky, said Sunday that the spying allegations were false and may even be the result of an internal conflict between the Pentagon and the CIA.

Israeli military intelligence chief Maj.-Gen. Aharon denied that Israel is collecting intelligence information in the United States.

"We are not running any operatives or collecting intelligence in the U.S.," he said Sunday. "The U.S. is an ally. I believe that this is an internal problem."

Jewish leaders questioned the motives behind the leak to the media Friday, and the timing. "This thing smells," one former senior AIPAC staffer told JTA. "The Pentagon does not need AIPAC to carry messages to the Israeli government for them. They have continuous high-level channels of communication."

Israeli officials in Washington say they were not officially approached by investigators in this case and learned of it through media accounts.

Iranian Shihab 3 missile upgraded

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The warhead of the Iranian Shihab-3 missile has been considerably upgraded, according to photographs published in Iranian newspapers of test launches three weeks ago.

It is believed that the improvements will permit slower entry into the atmosphere so the warhead, which may be chemical in nature, will be more durable and its contents will be better protected. It is also believed that the missile's range has been extended.

The operational and technological conclusions from the changes in the missile indicate that the Iranians are not resting on their laurels in developing their surface-to-surface missiles, and have shown a daring approach to their technological planning. It is very likely that the Iranians are being assisted by foreign experts from the former Soviet Union hired by Iran under personal contracts, or by experts from North Korea.

It is also likely that the Iranian effort is not limited to the Shihab-3, which has a range of about 1,300 kilometres, but also to the Shihab-4, planned with a range of 2,000 kilometres or more.

At present, the Shihab-3 can already come within range of Turkey, which is a member of NATO, as well as most Saudi Arabian cities and oil fields. On the last test of the Shihab-3 on Aug. 11, the missile did not pass the maximum trajectory that had been determined for it.

The Iranians gave the experimental launch extensive media coverage, stressing that the test was a response to an Israeli experimental launch of the Arrow missile, which intercepted a Scud missile in the United States at the end of July.

It subsequently turned out that the reported success of the Shihab's launch was intended to camouflage a failure in the missile's flight early in the launch.

However, the photographs published by the Iranians show several new details. In addition to the new warhead, the missile was fired from an operational vehicle and not from an ordinary surface launcher. In all the other Shihab-3 tests, the warhead was cone-shaped, but this time it has a new, flatter shape and appears to have various short wings.

Experts from various countries are expected to analyze the technological and operational aspects of the new form of the Shihab-3. It is especially interesting to several European countries, which understand that the day is not far when Iranian missiles will be within range of a considerable portion of Europe.

He has a master's degree in international law and much Canadian-specific experience. "I know Canada; I am familiar with Canada," said Baker, who during the last few years has travelled back and forth between Israel and Canada for briefings with Canadian government international lawyers and meetings with members of the Jewish community and the Canadian press.

"I am looking forward to doing this full time," he said.

During his four-year term at the Israeli Embassy in Ottawa, Baker intends to initiate a number of projects in the areas of commerce, public policy and publicity. "There are important things to be done," he said.

"There is a tremendous potential for bilateral commerce and trade between Canada and Israel that's not being sufficiently utilized," he added, noting that advanced technology, agriculture, water and security-related industries are among the countries' points of common interest. "There is huge potential here. Canada has a lot to offer Israel and Israel has a lot to offer Canada."

Baker said there is a lot to be done, vis-à-vis the Canadian government, to try to persuade Canada to use its status in the UN. He noted that the current status of the UN as an entity increasingly abused by the Palestinians and the Arabs to push one-sided political stances is harmful not only to Israel, but also to the international court, the international community and the UN itself.

"As a country very much in favour of international organization and involvement in the international community as a whole, Canada has got a lot to say in the UN and I think that the country can play a very constructive role here," he said.

Baker also intends to improve Israel's public image in Canada. "Israel gets negative publicity for many reasons, including the fact that it's sexy to show violence on television. The very concerted campaign by the Palestinians and the Arabs in the international community to bash Israel takes its toll, and if one sees this [sort of thing] enough times, one tends to accept it," he said.

At the same time, Israel has been criticized for not employing sufficient counter-tactics, he said. "Everyone always says we don't explain ourselves. But I am very happy to explain and answer whatever I can, to the greatest extent possible, and I will certainly try to help whoever wants to support Israel and fight anti-Semitism by providing whatever information is necessary to those who want it."

> 'Canada has got a lot to say in the UN and I think that the country can play a very constructive role here'

Baker is no stranger to anti-Israel sentiment in Canada. In October 2002, when he tried to deliver a paper on the use of children in terrorism to students at Concordia University in Montreal, he was swarmed and was removed from the premises by a police escort. "In Canada, there are problems here and there, especially on the campuses," he said. "But I understand that the Canadian authorities take these things very seriously."

Baker said that Canada, whose justice system and history he has been studying intensely for the last few months, is a living example of a great democracy.

"Perhaps one of the serious positive aspects that Canada is showing to the world is the extent to which it integrates minorities of all types in its society. Having read up on the country's constitution and its legislation on basic rights, I can say it's extremely impressive.

"That there's a vibrant, active, intelligent, serious Jewish community in Canada which has its status and has what [something] to say and says it, and this is a very important part of the democratic makeup of Canada.

"This isn't the situation in places like Norway and France and Scandinavia and other places. Even in Britain, it's very difficult for a local Jewish community to come out and express themselves. There is a very serious, growing anti-Semitism, and I hope it won't happen in Canada.

"What we want to do is bring Canada in. We want to bring Canada closer to a better understanding of why Israel has to act the way it does and what the problems are that we are facing."

Baker already has some experience in that area. He met with Canadian government officials in January in an attempt to persuade them to side with America and Australia against the implementation of the Advisory Opinion of the International Court of Justice regarding Israel's construction of the security fence.

Although in the end, Canada decided to remain neutral by casting a vote of abstinence, Baker says it wasn't a total loss. "Obviously, we would have preferred Canada to help us, but the fact that Canada separated itself from the European vote is significant. We saw this as an important message to the Europeans," he said.

"Obviously the Jewish communities of Canada were a bit upset. But we tend to see the cup as half empty rather than half full."

Baker applies the same brand of optimism to the Canadian winter. When he visited Canada in January, temperatures went down to 40 degrees. "It was so cold," he said. But he plans to make the best of it by taking up cross-country skiing. "I also look forward to skating on the canal in Ottawa."

Still, as a veteran of the Yom Kippur War who made aliyah from Leeds, England, with his family in July 1969 at the age of 21, Baker says he will miss Israel. "Since learning more about Canada, I must say we're very excited and we are looking forward to getting down to work," he said, speaking on behalf of him and his wife, Dalia, who unlike his three sons, will be joining him in Ottawa. "But I will miss Israel very much. We made aliyah because we love Israel.

"But we will be the face of Israel vis-à-vis the Canadian public. And, the most important thing is to represent Israel to the Canadian public, to the Canadian government, to the Canadian media, to the Jewish community, to the Christian community and others, in the best possible way."

Police: Suspected arsonist of Paris Jewish centre is an ex-employee

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — A man suspected of setting a fire that destroyed a Jewish community centre in Paris was taken into police custody early Monday, a police spokesperson said.

According to a police source, the man arrested was a Jewish former employee of the community centre. The man, who was described as being in his 50s, apparently wanted to avenge himself.

However, no official identification of the suspect in custody or explanation of his motive has so far been provided.

The arson attack on the community centre, committed on August 22, was thought to have been carried out by neo-Nazis because anti-Semitic slogans and swastikas had been scrawled on the wall of the building.

The fire provoked widespread outrage in France and prompted last week's three-day visit to Paris by Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom to discuss the French campaign against anti-Semitism.

Shalom had demanded that French authorities react more harshly to anti-Semitic acts.

However, because of a number of clues, investigators had come to suspect that the fire may have been an "internal affair," rather than a racist act.

Israel imposes blockades

Israel imposed blockades on Gaza last week in an attempt to stop Palestinian rocket and mortar attacks. Officials said the army blocked a road linking the northern and southern parts of the strip. In addition, the Gush Katif junction was blocked to Palestinian traffic, as was the coastal road west of Netzarim in central Gaza. The move came after five people in the Israeli town of Sderot were treated for shock after two rockets hit the town.

Gandhi scion visits Arafat

Mahatma Gandhi's grandson preached the doctrine of peaceful resistance to Yasser Arafat last week. After a meeting at the Palestinian Authority president's Ramallah headquarters, Arun Gandhi told reporters the Israeli-Palestinian conflict might have been ended by now if the Palestinians had adopted his grandfather's strategy. "If the Palestinian people rise up and start a non-violent movement, it will boost world sympathy," Gandhi said. "The nations of the world will rise up and put more pressure on Israel." Arafat did not speak at the news conference.

Gaza intel chief hit

Palestinian gunmen ambushed a Gaza Strip security chief last week. Tarek Abu-Rajeb, deputy head of the Palestinian Authority's general intelligence service in Gaza, was seriously wounded by shots fired at his car outside the Bureij refugee camp. Two bodyguards were killed. PA officials have come under attack recently from vigilantes seeking to end corruption in Gaza and the West Bank. Israel was not involved in the incident, security sources said.

Shalom praises Paris

Israel praised France for fighting anti-Semitic attacks on its citizens, but said more action is needed. "We are very happy that France is now leading the combat against anti-Semitism, but we would like to see it translated to actions in schools and universities," Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom said last week during a visit to a Jewish community centre in Paris that was torched the previous weekend. Experts believe Jews in Europe are increasingly being targeted by local Muslim youth swayed by anti-Israel propaganda. French officials vowed to crack down.

Egyptian politician distances party from article denying Holocaust

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

CAIRO — A leading member of Egypt's ruling party distanced the party and the country last week from a column in a party newspaper that called the Holocaust a Zionist "lie."

In a front-page statement last Thursday in the weekly Al-Lewaa al-Islami, Mamdouh el-Beltagui wrote, "The National Democratic Party… does not believe that human tragedies and suffering that befell a nation or a people could be a lie."

El-Beltagui signed the statement as a member of the party's policy-making secretariat and head of its information department, but he is also the government's information minister.

Al-Lewaa al-Islami – which means "The Islamic Banner" – published two columns earlier this summer by Rifaat Sayed Ahmed that said that to justify the founding of Israel, "the Zionist movement… resorted to means that are closer to lies and myths more than reality and truth."

Ahmed, who heads a think tank specializing in Palestinian and Lebanese Islamic movements, said among the untruths was "the lie of burning the Jews in the Nazi gas chambers during World War II."

El-Beltagui said Ahmed's comment "about the lie of burning the Jews does not reflect the Egyptian man's thinking or the ideology or the policies of the National Democratic Party."

Al-Lewaa al-Islami, which is devoted to Muslim issues, is one of several party publications that include the flagship daily Mayo.

After receiving criticism, the little-known weekly said in a previous edition that the two columns expressed only "the opinion of the writer, which is subject to discussion, agreement or rejection."

Ahmed's columns have since disappeared and editor Mohammed al-Zorkany resigned without explanation.

Ahmed's articles were translated and disseminated in the United States by the Middle East Media Research Institute, a Washington-based organization that keeps a close eye on anti-Semitic comment in the Arab media.

In a statement last month, the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Center, which fosters remembrance of the Holocaust and campaigns for human rights, said the columns were intended "to increase the hatred of Jewish people, demonize Israel and her Zionist supporters and desecrate the memories of the victims of Nazism."

Synagogue donor among Russian crash victims

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — One of the main funders of a renovation project at a Moscow synagogue was among at least 89 people killed in a plane crash last week in Russia.

"Who was he? He was a good Jew," Yitzhak Kogan of Moscow's Bolshaya Bronnaya Synagogue said of Tengiz Yakobashvili of Moscow.

Yakobashvili's friend and business partner, David Cohen of St. Petersburg, also died in Tuesday night's crash of a flight bound from Moscow to the southern Russian city of Volgograd.

A second flight, from Moscow to the Black Sea resort of Sochi, crashed a few minutes later.

The cause is still to be determined, but officials were not ruling out a possible terrorist connection – perhaps to separatist Chechen rebels, who have been fighting a prolonged war with Russia.

Both of the confirmed Jewish victims were of Georgian descent, and both reportedly held Israeli citizenship.

Cohen reportedly had lived in Israel for several years. Yakobashvili's wife and children are believed to live currently in the Jewish state.

Cohen, who was in his early 50s, was a well-known, active member of the Georgian Jewish community in St. Petersburg, Menachem Mendel Pevzner, the city's chief rabbi, said.

The two passenger liners vanished from radar screens at the same time, around 11 p.m. on Tuesday. Several hours later, the remains of the Volgograd-bound plane were discovered near a village in Central Russia's Tula region.

The remains of the second plane were recovered later near Rostov-on-Don.

A happy coincidence spared the life of Zalman Yoffe, a Chabad rabbi in Volgograd who said he was supposed to be on one of the flights that crashed.

Yoffe had a meeting with donors in Moscow scheduled for Tuesday, and then was due to return home. He rescheduled his return flight when the meeting was postponed by a day.

"Thank God I was saved, but this doesn't make the tragedy any smaller, because dozens were killed, including two Jews," he said.

Yoffe said he would take the same flight Wednesday night so he could console victims' relatives, Jewish or non-Jewish.

"This is our common tragedy," he said. "We as Jews shouldn't be indifferent to other people's tragedies."

Yoffe said the tragedy was particularly acute because he had known Cohen.

Arieh Edelkopf, a Chabad rabbi in Sochi, said the city's mayor has asked him to help console victims' relatives.

"As a rabbi of this city, I have an obligation to do whatever is needed to help those who need help."

In 2001, Edelkopf helped to perform Jewish rituals over the remains of dozens of Jewish victims of a flight from Tel Aviv bound for Siberia that crashed over the Black Sea near Sochi.

The October 2001 tragedy, which killed 78 people – most of them vacationing Israelis – resulted from a military blunder when the plane was accidentally hit by a surface-to-air missile fired during a Ukrainian military exercise.

Sibir, the carrier that owned the plane that crashed three years ago, operated one of the planes that crashed last week.

Defence ministry confident despite Arrow's failure in latest missile test

By AMNON BARZILAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Arrow anti-ballistic missile is capable of intercepting an Iranian Shihab-3 missile, despite its failure to do so in a test last week off the California coast, said Aryeh Herzog, the Defence Ministry official in charge of the Arrow project.

The Arrow, which is being developed jointly by Israel and the United States, failed last Thursday to destroy a target missile simulating an Iranian Shihab-3 and a Scud-D of the type Syria possesses.

The Israeli monitoring centre found the Arrow succeeded in identifying the warhead in time, but the intercept failed because of an unidentified malfunction, possibly in the guidance system.

Herzog focused on the Arrow's ability to distinguish between different targets and ignore dummy targets, which is necessary in order to be able to destroy both the Iranian and Syrian missiles.

"The element of distinguishing was successful, and the element of final interception had a local malfunction in the Arrow missile," Herzog told Israel Radio. "Since 2002, the Air Force's system, which is operational, has been capable of intercepting Iranian Shihab-3 missiles, and we are certainly confident about this."

Shortly after a C-17 cargo plane dropped the U.S. target missile at Point Mogu off the California coast, the missile warhead separated from its engine at an altitude of dozens of kilometres. The aim was for the Arrow to distinguish between the missile engine and warhead, intercept the warhead and blow it up.

The test came about a month after a successful test in which a Scud missile was destroyed in a direct hit.

Defence Ministry director-general Amos Yaron said the test was substantive. "Most of the systems tested worked. There was a malfunction that needs to be sorted out, and we will continue to prepare to meet development of any future threats."

Dr. Marla is back for another season

By KATHRYN KATES

Dr. Marla Shapiro is about to embark on the new season of her television show, Balance – Television for Living Well, on CTV.

"In keeping with the flavour of what Balance is about, this season we are addressing the same issues of health and wellness. We incorporate all the things viewers tell us they need to know and that we feel they need to know. We offer insight into different areas, so that you can take it and make it yours," Shapiro. says.

Dr. Marla Shapiro

"We are continuing along with the 'Ask Dr. Marla' segment, along with advice from our expert of the day. Medicine today is as much about what you do for yourself as what your doctor does for you. We want to give you as much information as we can."

Shapiro describes some of the highlights of the show's new season.

"We have gone on location when it has merited going on location. We went to Los Angeles to see things like what happens behind [the scenes of the TV show] Extreme Makeover, we did a makeover in Montreal, and we went to New York where I did interviews with [TV co-hosts] Regis [Philbin] and Kelly [Ripa] and Meredith Viera [co-host of the TV show The View] and her husband, Richard Cohen, who wrote a book on coping with multiple sclerosis," says Shapiro.

She is the mother of three, aged nine to 19, a family physician, a medical expert for Canada AM, CTV and Newsnet and an assistant professor with the University of Toronto's Department of Family and Community Medicine.

It is clear that Shapiro herself knows how to balance all that is on her personal and professional plate. "The only way I balance, because I'm clearly balancing so much at any one time, is that I love everything I do, and if I try to maintain limits, I can balance," she says.

Shapiro was inspired by Nancy Sniderman, a doctor who is on American television. Shapiro says Sniderman is a leader in bringing information from medical journals to television viewers.

Shapiro, who practises what she preaches, advises women to eat a low-fat diet and take calcium and vitamin D to maintain bone health.

She keeps active and enjoys working out with a trainer, which she says is a great stress buster. In the winter, Shapiro and her family enjoy snow-shoeing. To relax, she likes to cook and entertain.

"Every once in a while," she says, "I stop and take inventory.

"Don't feel consumed by what you do. Find the time to invest in the things that make you happy. Make sure that you are living life as opposed to life living you," advises the good doctor.

Balance – Television for Living Well is on Mondays to Fridays at 1 p.m., starting Sept. 13, with daily repeats beginning the next week at 10 a.m.

CORRECTION

In the article "Arthritis clinic looks at new modes of treatment" (CJN, Aug. 26), the name of the director of the early arthritis program at Mount Sinai Hospital's Rebecca MacDonald Centre for Arthritis and Autoimmune Disease was spelled incorrectly. The correct spelling is Vivian Bykerk. The CJN regrets the error.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. My husband never eats breakfast. He says he doesn't have time. Do you have any tips to get him eating breakfast?

A. Breakfast really is an important meal. The sooner you start eating in the day, the quicker you turn on your metabolism. Many people don't eat breakfast, either because they don't have time or because they say they are not hungry. Not having time is not a reasonable excuse, because as far as I am concerned, anything constitutes breakfast as long as you eat it before lunch and anything is better than nothing.

Your husband may be thinking that breakfast has to be a hot, sit-down meal when really it could be a bowl of cereal at home or at his desk at the office, or it could be a piece of fruit in the car, a handful of almonds on the run or at work, a yogurt, one or two pieces of toast with almond butter, a low-fat, low-sugar bran muffin, a hard-boiled egg, a fruit and yogurt smoothie or even a latte made with half milk and half coffee. If you suggest or even help prepare some of these choices, I think you have a good chance of persuading your husband to have breakfast.

There are simple explanations for lack of appetite in the morning and mid-morning hunger pangs after eating breakfast. You're not hungry in the morning because your body isn't used to being fed at that time. You get hungry mid-morning if you only breakfast occasionally because your body thinks you've just had lunch and that it's mid-afternoon. It takes about six to eight weeks of eating breakfast regularly until your body regulates itself, but it's well worth it.

Q. As the kids head back to school, I need a refresher course in that manic after-school time when everyone comes home hungry and rushing.

A. Remember that you are in control of what your kids eat at home. If you don't want them eating junk, then don't have it in the house, but provide some kid friendly alternatives.

Some great, healthy snacks include cereal with milk (not a highsugar cereal though); baked nachos with salsa, melted cheese, low-fat sour cream or guacamole; hummus and whole wheat pita; yogurt and fruit smoothies; yogurt sundaes (use either soft or frozen yogurt and top with fruit, granola, chocolate sauce or honey); fruit; raw veggies and dip; peanut butter and jam; last night's leftovers; soup; hot chocolate made with milk; air-popped popcorn; oatmeal cookies; nuts; homemade muffins (banana, bran, oatmeal, carrot, and even throw in some chocolate chips); cheese and whole wheat crackers; milk and chocolate milk. Have some of these on hand and everyone should be happy.

Ira loses the Shabbat box and makes a new one

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

It's always fun when you get a chance to look after something for your teacher, especially when you get to take it home. Sometimes a teacher lets you take home a class pet, or a plant, or a fish.

Ira's teacher in The Shabbat Box, by Lesley Simpson with illustrations by Nicole inden Bosch (Kar-Ben Copies, 2001), had a very special Shabbat box. In it were candlesticks, a kiddush cup and a challah cover. As an extra special treat, there were always fresh challah rolls with raisins.

All the kids loved the box and wanted to take it home for the weekend. The problem was that since there was only one box, and there were 14 students in the class, they each had to wait a long time for their turn.

Now, waiting for something you really want to do is always hard. (By the way, it is hard for grown-ups, too, not just for kids.) Ira knew that he would have to wait for winter for his turn, and his mother told him it wouldn't be until "after the leaves fall off the trees and snow comes," which would be about 14 weeks, and 98 sleeps. To Ira, that felt like forever.

Finally, winter came, and it was his turn. Putting the box in his backpack, he started home. Unfortunately, "there was a bad snowstorm. The wind whipped his face. His eyes were so cold they felt like popsicles. His feet got soaked from snow falling into his boots."

When he got home, he realized that because of the storm, the backpack had opened and the Shabbat box had fallen out.

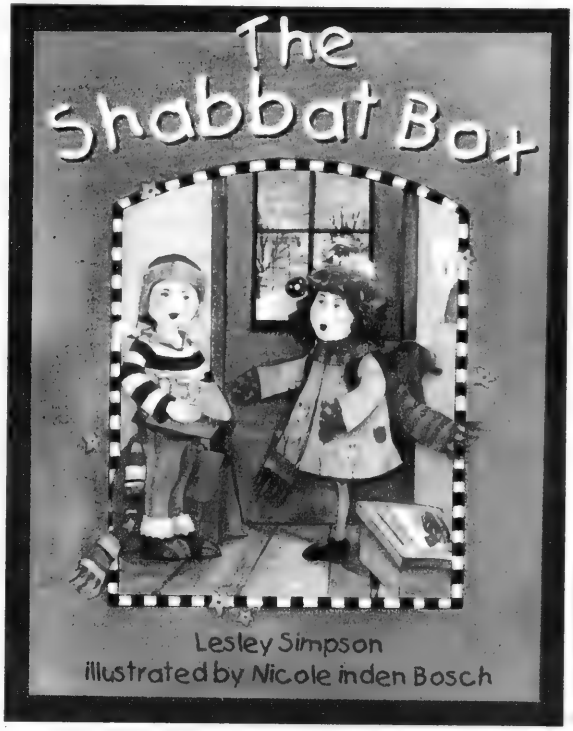
You can imagine how awful Ira felt. He and his father tried to find it, but the storm was too bad. He felt totally miserable, and tried to figure out what to do. Finally, he decided: He would make a new Shabbat box.

After Havdalah, he put a do-not-disturb sign on his door, took his art supplies – and a camping flashlight, so he could work in secret – and started making the new box.

Ira decorated it with purple velvet and sparkles, turned his Plasticine snakes into candlesticks, created a Shabbat game, made his pillowcase into a challah cover, and put lollipops, taffy, candy and chocolates inside, "because Shabbat should be sweet."

He wrapped the box in plastic, just in case it fell into a snowbank.

Luckily, that didn't happen, and Ira got the box to school safely on Monday. He admitted that he had lost the box and said he was sorry. That is very hard to do, and a lot of people don't have the courage to do it.



When he opened the box, all the kids got very excited and couldn't wait to get the chance to take the new box home with them.

The teacher had another surprise. She told the class that after school on Friday, she forgot something, and had to go back to the school. She found the first box in the snow and rescued it. It was all right, except the box and the challah rolls were soggy.

Still, the box could be used. So the class had two Shabbat boxes, and the children could have a turn in only half the time.

KIDDISH

Jewish Kids' Fun Page
by Ellene Newman and Hallel Newman

"Beautiful apples, fresh from the orchard, only three kopeks each!"

Tante Hinda, the old widow, stood by her rickety cart in the crisp autumnal air, advertising her wares. Nearby, three boys chased each other around the small wooden houses of the Polish shtetl. "Perfect for your Rosh Hashana table, sweet, juicy...Oy! What are you doing?"

The boys were running in her direction, malicious grins adorning their cherubic faces. As Tante Hinda frantically tried to stop them, they knocked over her cart, laughing as a river of apples cascaded over the dirt road. Then they vanished, weighted down with sweet, juicy apples, fresh from the orchard, for their Rosh Hashana tables.

Little Yisrael Meir, sitting on a pickle barrel, watched the entertainment with interest. When several apples rolled toward him on the wooden planks which made up the sidewalk, he scooped them up. By the time he got home later that day, they had been reduced to discarded cores and forgotten memories.

After the holidays, school began again. "Lo Tigzol, DO NOT STEAL," intoned the melamed (teacher), reading from the Torah. Yisrael Meir froze, remembering the apples he had taken. After school, he ran home to his mother.

"Could I have nine kopeks please?" he asked her.

"Certainly," she said, getting the money.

As Yisrael Meir approached the street where Tante Hinda sold her apples, he realized that she probably had forgotten about the whole thing. Maybe she wouldn't even take the money.

Reaching her cart he announced, "I'd like to buy some apples, please."

"Here you go," she replied, taking his nine kopeks and handing him his apples.

Yisrael dropped them back into the cart as gently as possible, and bolted away, leaving Tante Hinda shouting "Come back, come back!"

The debt was paid off.

Yisrael Meir Kagan grew up to be the renowned author and Rabbi known as the Chafetz Chaim. He lived from 1838 to 1933.

Jackie Rosenbaum loves being bad.

Actor enjoys playing quirky roles

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

If there is one thing Jackie Rosenbaum loves, it's being bad.

The badder, the better, the 24-year-old actor suggests coyly.

"I really like those roles. They're interesting, quirky and fun," the dark-haired starlet of several TV shows and movies says with a pixie-like smile.

Taking a quick look at her past performances reveals a list of characters that are "a bit off," as Rosenbaum puts it.

In the Disney series In A Heartbeat, Rosenbaum plays Catie Roth, the rebel Goth best friend who is too hip to be part of the crowd. In Exhibit A, Secrets in Forensic Science, she plays a babysitter who turns her back on the baby for that one fateful moment. In YTV's animated series Girlstuff/Boystuff, she voices the character of Talia, the sarcastic teen.

And then there's Ditz, the best friend and supportive ally that Rosenbaum plays in Brave New Girl, a Lions Gate Television production shot in Toronto and aired on ABC Family earlier this year. As Ditz, Rosenbaum portrays a gifted dancer from a privileged background in a film based on A Mother's Gift, a book written by pop star Britney Spears and her mother Lynne Spears.

The film focuses on the life of a teenage singer from a small town in Texas who is accepted to a performing arts academy, only to learn that adapting to the East Coast school is a lot harder than she expected.

The main character is supposed to be Britney, even though the singer doesn't appear in the movie. While Britney's song Brave New Girl is included in the movie, "Britney didn't make it past the audition process," Rosenbaum says.

The native Torontonian was in Israel just "hanging out" when her agent called to tell her about the part and she came back to Toronto to shoot the film. Now that the film is over, Rosenbaum hopes to head back to Israel as soon as possible.

"In between shoots, I go to Israel," Rosenbaum said.

"It's an amazing place," she added. "I mean, where else do you get into heated political debates with the cab drivers?"

The actor maintains that she tries to stay away from all the political issues that usually concern the media. Instead, she just loves soaking up the social and cultural side of the country.

"I stay with friends, in hostels and in kibbutzim, and I promise my agent that I'll never go outside.

"I guess he's a bit scared," she says with a laugh.

Rosenbaum graduated from Associated Hebrew Schools, went to the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and then to William Lyon Mackenzie High School.

"I've always been involved in acting," Rosenbaum said. She studied drama and theory at the Sharper Image Academy of Speech and Drama and recalls with fondness playing Dorothy in The Wizard of Oz, Associated's Grade 8 graduating play.

She spent a year studying theatre at the University of Toronto before her career started to seriously get in the way.

"I was missing too many classes because of Heartbeat and had to drop out of second year," Rosenbaum said. She is still taking some classes at U of T to stay connected and travelling to see what's out there.

On a recent trip to Budapest, she discovered that media work seems to run in her family. Her uncle, Andras Kepets, won the Hungarian publisher of the year award in 2002. Her brother, Richard Rosenbaum, is a writer whose work has appeared in The CJN, as well as in Eye Weekly.

Her mother, Eva, who is from Hungary, met her father, Robert, while visiting Toronto in the early 1970s.

One thing she seems to have learned is that there really is no point making plans.

"Things just seem to happen," Rosenbaum said. "And I've learned to just take them as they come."

Actor hopes to be second time lucky at TIFF

By TAMMY STONE
Special to The CJN

When Winnipeg native Jonas Chernick came to the Toronto International Film Festival in 2001 as the lead in a Canadian indie first feature, Inertia, he could not have predicted the impact it would have on his career.

Three years later, with a string of TV and film successes behind him, he returns to the festival in Gary Yates' Seven Times Lucky, where he plays a pivotal role opposite Kevin Pollak.

Chernick is all smiles and brimming with energy when I meet him at a Second Cup downtown. As we talk, I am struck by his intense drive and affable modesty – he exudes a presence that leaves no doubt of his vocation as an actor.

Jonas Chernick

His parents picked up on this early on, and at age seven, Chernick entered the prestigious Manitoba Theatre for Young People. He hasn't stopped performing since, and he says that Winnipeg, a relatively small but thriving mecca for both Canadian and American film and TV, was an auspicious gateway to the world of acting.

"There has always been a strong cultural feeling in Winnipeg and I always loved that," says Chernick. "I would have stayed there if I could have."

At 19, immersed in the University of Manitoba's Black Hole Theatre program, he stumbled into his first film appearance as an extra on Careful, a film by Winnipeg filmmaker Guy Maddin, who has since become a darling of the international art world with films like Heart of the World and Saddest Music in the World.

"It was my first time on a movie set," Chernick says. "And what a movie set, because… [Maddin] builds these elaborate worlds. They're gorgeous, and it was this mountain top vista world, and I just spent the whole day wide-eyed, going around amazed at everything I was seeing."

After finishing university, founding a successful theatre company called The Conspiracy Network, and working on several movies in Winnipeg, Chernick moved to Toronto in 2000.

Meanwhile, Chernick was still connected to his roots in Winnipeg and was developing some film projects back home. One of them was Inertia, Sean Garrity's little feature that could.

With no funding, and based on an idea that four characters are in love with someone among them who doesn't love them back, Inertia began as a six-month intensive workshop that had Chernick and three other Winnipeg actors improvise until they knew everything about their characters – a gruelling but enormously rewarding experience. The result is a film that pulsates with energy and raw, exceptional performances.

"We never thought for a second that this little project we were working on [would get funded]," says Chernick. "It was more of an exercise, and we were happy with that. Suddenly we've got half a million bucks and we're shooting a movie."

Not only that, but the film got into the Toronto film festival in 2001.

Inertia wound up snagging the prize for best first Canadian feature.

"[Winning] changed everything," Chernick says. "I'm suddenly getting phone calls [and] we got a distributor, so it was playing around the country."

A few months later, Chernick went to Los Angeles to try to break into acting there. Three months and $20,000 later, he returned to Toronto.

"It was horrible. But it taught me I wasn't going to go back until I was ready."

Toronto was a different story. Hot off the success of Inertia, Chernick had a big break when he landed a recurring role on CTV's acclaimed drama The Eleventh Hour. He also worked on several TV movies with actors like Julie Andrews (Eloise at the Plaza) and Jeremy Irons and Neve Campbell (Last Call). Armed with an ever-growing demo reel, he headed back to Los Angeles in July 2003, and this time, hooked up with a manager who loved what he saw and was intent on fostering Chernick's career.

Before succeeding in his 2004 pilot season in Los Angeles, however, he read the script for Seven Times Lucky, fellow Winnipeger Gary Yates' first film.

Seven Times Lucky is an amazingly accomplished first feature and a brilliant turn for veteran Hollywood actor Kevin Pollak in his first lead role as a small-time grifter. Chernick shines as a loveable but misguided con man caught up in a downward spiral of events involving his girlfriend, played by New Waterford Girl's Liane Balaban, and Pollak.

"Working with Kevin was another one of those marker experiences that really helped shape and inform who I am in my career. He's one of the funniest men I ever met, he's constantly entertaining you and making you laugh. He takes the work very seriously and he takes great pride in his work and he really savoured the experience of being a leading man in this film… in a way, he took me under his wing. I was a sponge around him trying to absorb as much as I could."

While splitting his time between Toronto and L.A. is a challenge, Chernick is committed to the Canadian film industry and is proud of the work he's done on Canadian short and feature-length films.

"If I could sustain a career making films in Canada, I would never leave this country," he says, pointing to Canadian film stars like Sarah Polley, Callum Keith Rennie and Don McKellar, who have found constant work here.

"This is where my home is," he says, smiling. "And this is where I want to make my future."

With Seven Times Lucky already a runaway hit at the Sundance film festival a few months ago, Chernick is looking forward to this year's Toronto festival experience, and is also co-writing a number of Canadian feature films in development, including Sean Garrity's follow-up to Inertia, which will shoot this fall.

TV DOCUMENTARY FILMMAKER OFFERS 'PERSONAL BIOGRAPHIES' FOR PRIVATE CLIENTS ON DVD

Tower City Productions, a North York-based producer of television documentaries, has begun producing personal biographies for private clients "who wish to leave a professional-looking video biography for their children and posterity," said president Len Scher.

"Everybody can now preserve their life story with a professional, well-edited production, including music, still photographs, newspaper clippings, a lengthy interview, titles and special effects," said the award-winning producer of TV documentaries on such topics as Yiddish, the Holocaust, Jewish soldiers in the American Civil War and the question of whether Christopher Columbus was Jewish.

"The demand is there," said company spokesperson Karen Fejer, who added that the final product would be preserved as a DVD. "Everybody can leave a video legacy – an entertaining reminder of what they accomplished in their life and career."

Scher said he is just as proud of the private biographies he has made as "some of the programs I produced for CBC, the NFB or Discovery." The company has also produced "talking books" for McClelland & Stewart and other clients. For details, phone 416-635-7388 or e-mail tower@rogers.com.

Recently in Print: In Who Killed the Canadian Military? (Harper Flamingo Canada), eminent historian J. L. Granatstein points the finger at a succession of postwar governments that have drained our country's military resources while perpetuating the myth that we are the ultimate global peacekeepers.

In tracing the demise of Canada's military in the postwar era, Granatstein asserts that Lester Pearson gave the nation the "fatal distraction" of its peacekeeping role, that John Diefenbaker pursued an anti-American path and that Pierre Trudeau contributed "malign neglect" to the military. Granatstein further observes that while Brian Mulroney offered a "false dawn" of hope, Jean Chretien blithely offered "last rites" to all but finish off our fighting forces.

The book, which is about Granatstein's 60th in print, outlines a means of resurrecting the military. The author is a former officer and chair of the Council for Canadian Security in the 21st Century, a pro-defence lobby group.

"If the choice is, as the old economist's saying goes, for guns or butter, then I guess I'm for guns," he writes, fully acknowledging the changed global situation since 9/11. "In a country as rich as ours, I believe we can have both. Without the guns, someone just might come along to take our butter away."

Former actor casts performers for TV ads and movies

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"Think of a product and we've probably done a commercial for it," said Brian Levy.

Levy's company, Powerhouse Casting, with offices in Toronto and Vancouver, casts actors for made-in-Canada television commercials.

Several months ago, his company, Brian Levy Casting, merged with Kim Everest's Powerhouse Casting, making the newly reconfigured firm Canada's largest casting agency of its kind.

"When we're not particularly busy, some of our competitors think that's busy," said Levy, explaining its heft.

Under the new setup, Levy is casting director, while Everest is president.

Last year, both companies provided the actors for 1,200 commercial productions, representing more than half of the casting business in Canada.

Powerhouse auditions actors, and deals with advertising agencies and production companies.

"We don't represent any of the actors," said Levy, a 46-year-old former actor who plied his trade in Vancouver. "That would be a conflict of interest for us."

Powerhouse has cast actors for ads singing the praises of products ranging from Coca Cola and Pepsi Cola soft drinks and Labatt and Molson beer to Crest toothpaste and BMW, Chrysler and Ford automobiles.

In addition, Powerhouse casts actors for television shows (America's Most Wanted, prime-time productions (Movies of the Week) and films (Sam and Me and Perfectly Normal).

"Anything that needs actors we cast for," said Levy. "But our primary focus is TV commercials."

Levy has no trouble matching actors with ads because Toronto's talent pool is so wide and deep.

"Just in the Greater Toronto Area, there are about 12,000 unionized actors and at least 80 talent agents."

Levy also auditions actors from virtually every nook and cranny of the province, and works with agents from across Ontario.

On a recent afternoon, when this reporter arrived to interview Levy, the waiting room in Powerhouse was packed with candidates patiently waiting to be auditioned.

Many were well-behaved children under the age of 10, accompanied by their mothers.

A few were adults, mainly young women.

"We cast thousands of actors in a year," said Levy.

Some ads require as many as 30 or so performers, while others need only one or two actors.

Actors who belong to the union earn a standard $585 for a nine-hour day, plus residuals.

Non-union fees are negotiable.

Ads are typically created months in advance and vetted by specially selected focus groups.

Powerhouse comes into the act once an ad is ready to be produced. Only very rarely does a production company reject an actor chosen by Powerhouse.

Ads are not necessarily solely for Canadian audiences. Powerhouse works with American, European and Latin American companies.

Brian Levy and his partner, Kim Everest, the proprietors of a Toronto casting company.

"Anyone who comes to Canada to shoot we're dealing with," Levy said. "Canada has a crappy dollar, and that's what brings business here."

Levy, who says he is in "the business of illusion," works with a full-time staff of 12 casting agents.

Actors audition for Levy and his associates in two on-site studios, which are also used for voice-overs.

According to Levy, the partnership between his company and Powerhouse Casting seemed destined.

"It was just a natural evolution. Kim and I have known each other for years. Our styles are very similar and we complement each other. We were competitors, but we never, ever went after each other's clients. I've always respected her as a casting director. Her knowledge of the Canadian talent pool is truly encyclopedic."

He believes that the merger enhances the company's highly customized casting services.

"Individual attention to clients continues to be one of our greatest assets. It provides a quintessential casting environment because we are aware of the little details that make each client different and each production deserving of the best and most appropriate on-air and voice talent."

Speaking of their alliance, Everest – a former casting executive for two of the country's largest independent production houses – observed, "Consistency is the key to success in the casting business. With over 40 years of experience between the two of us, we believe our clientele will benefit from the depth and diversity of our backgrounds.

Born and raised in Toronto, the son of Edward and Barbara, Levy graduated from North Toronto Collegiate and studied briefly at the University of Waterloo.

Following his dream, he enrolled at the Vancouver Playhouse (which no longer exists) for a two-year acting program.

"I always loved the arts and the theatre. My parents didn't encourage me to become an actor, but they didn't fight it either."

Looking back at the Vancouver Playhouse, Levy mused, "It was a great place to train, and was geared to turning out professionals."

As it happened, Levy was an actor for only short periods of time.

The highwater mark of his career occurred when he collaborated with the illustrious American playwright Tennessee Williams in a Vancouver Playhouse production.

When he was not acting, Levy worked for the Vancouver Playhouse in various administrative capacities, including ticket development.

In 1983, he returned to Ontario as a publicist for a theatre in Barrie.

Then he managed a mime theatre and was employed by a production and a casting company.

In 1986, he struck out on his own, establishing Brian Levy Casting.

Having been an actor himself, Levy has a special affinity with the actors who troop to his office in search of jobs.

"I work with actors. I understand what they go through in an audition. Actors put it on the line every day."

Windsurfer Gal Fridman wins Israel's first Olympic gold

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

ATHENS — A moment after it was all over, Gal Fridman let out a tremendous roar. "I knew it before the finish," the Israeli windsurfer explained later. "I knew the gold medal was mine."

Fridman jumped into the water, seated himself on his sailboard and clearly didn't know what to do. Dozens of photographers called out to him to smile, and somebody tossed him an Israeli flag. Fridman – who had promised before the race that he would bring home Israel's first-ever Olympic gold medal – appeared stunned.

He finished the final race in second place, while Brazil's Ricardo Santos, who on the eve of the race had led by three points, was pushed to 17th place and finished fourth overall. Nikos Kaklamanakis of Greece finished in 10th place and took the silver medal. Nick Dempsey of Britain won bronze.

Fridman's shock only intensified by evening. After receiving the gold medal from International Olympic Committee member Alex Giladi, and after singing the national anthem Hatikvah, the ceremony turned into a free-for-all. Most of the audience descended on the awards podium, enveloping the silver and bronze medalists along with Fridman.

Israeli Education, Culture and Sport Minister Limor Livnat was caught in the onslaught of people. "An entire country is happy now," she said. "Gal raised Israel on a crest, and it's the whole country's victory."

The awards ceremony wasn't the first time Fridman sang the national anthem. A few minutes after completing his 11th and final race, Fridman, his coach Gur Steinberg, and teammate Lee Korzits rehearsed for the evening.

"We couldn't hold back," laughed Fridman. "We waited so many years, and now it's happened."

His girlfriend of nine years, Michal Peleg, said Fridman had seemed "too calm, nonchalant. I looked for the enthusiasm before the race, the excitement. He was totally cool. I came to Athens because Gal promised me we'd hear the anthem."

The race itself went according to plan. "I was into it – I was so focused on the target," Fridman said. "If a negative thought accidentally popped up, I gave it the boot."

Fridman opened strong and continued to advance, while Santos and Kaklamanakis couldn't manage to edge close to the lead.

"At the first buoy, I knew I had an opportunity and must use it to my advantage," Fridman said. "But I was smart and calculating, and that was the difference between me and the Brazilian. He lost his grip when he saw I had gotten away from him. It cost him a medal."

Amid the festivities, Fridman managed to speak by phone with Israeli President Moshe Katsav, to squeeze in a brief conversation with newly minted bronze medalist Arik Ze'evi, and to sit in the lobby of his hotel and give interviews to every possible media outlet, including foreign journalists interested in Israel's first-ever Olympic gold medal.

"It's tremendous happiness, tremendous joy," Fridman said. "I don't really know what I was thinking when I finished, except that great joy suddenly erupted. I know that everyone in Israel was following me. I felt it, and it gave me energy. I won because I believed in my goal. If I had settled for a silver or bronze medal, I wouldn't have achieved the gold.

"For several months now I've had a good feeling about this, and I couldn't let the country down. I knew that anything less than gold wouldn't cut it."

A few days after Fridman's historic accomplishment, Israel's last good hope for a second gold medal, pole vaulter Alex Averbukh, fell short.

Averbukh finished eighth after failing to clear the bar at 5.75 metres.

The 2002 European champion entered the final after clearing all his jumps without a single foul, but on the gold medal night, he was unable to handle the pressure. He appeared unable to focus as he failed to position his jumps. His final attempt at 5.75 metres went under the bar.

Alex Averbukh

Averbukh, who failed to make the final in Sydney four years ago, said the pressure to return with a medal was too great.

"People say 'Alex bring us a medal,' but it's tough," Averbukh said in a TV interview.

"Why didn't I manage to clear at 5.75? Perhaps it's a mental thing, perhaps physical, perhaps both. Athletes are people, not machines and perhaps my fitness wasn't good enough. But I was in an Olympic final and people should respect that."

Averbukh said that despite failing to medal at two Olympic finals he would now set his sights on Beijing 2008.

"I want to secure a place at Beijing and end my career there," he said. "If I make it to Beijing, I want to march in the opening ceremony."

American Tim Mack won the title with an Olympic record of 5.95 meters. Averbukh's personal best is 5.93 metres.

Israel finished this year's Games in 52nd position overall. Joining Fridman on the medal podium was judoka Arik Ze'evi, who earlier won a bronze.

OATMEAL-APPLE COOKIES

1-1/2 cup quick cooking rolled oats
3/4 cup all purpose flour
3/4 cup whole wheat flour
1/2 cup brown sugar, firmly packed
1 tsp. baking powder
1/4 tsp. baking soda
1/2 tsp. salt
1-1/2 tsp. cinnamon
1/2 cup raisins
1 cup finely chopped & peeled Granny Smith apple
1 egg, slightly beaten
1/2 cup honey
1/2 cup vegetable oil
1/3 cup milk

Preheat oven to 375°F. In medium bowl, combine oats, both flours, brown sugar, baking powder, soda, salt, and cinnamon. Stir to combine. Stir in raisins and apples. In large bowl, combine egg, honey, oil, and milk. Stir in dry ingredients. Mix to form a smooth batter. Drop batter onto ungreased baking sheets, using a rounded teaspoon of dough for each cookie, leaving 2" between, for spreading. Dip fingers into water and press dough down to about 1-1/2" diameter. Bake 10-12 minutes or until lightly golden. Remove from oven, transfer to cooling rack. Yield: 3 dozen.

Money Matters

Earning our judgment faithfully

Rabbi Jay Kelman, C.A.

When we think of the Yamim Nora'im, our thoughts focus on such items as family, prayer, repentance, health and happiness. Rarely do people dwell on the economic aspects of these days. Yet a glance at the Al Chets that we recite on Yom Kippur show the central role that "economic sins" play.

The connection between our money and the High Holy Days is an expression of the true essence of a religious Jew. Rosh Hashanah is Yom Hadin, the day of judgment, both individually and collectively. While many may not feel or even realize that God is passing a verdict upon us, ultimately we will all come face to face with our Maker. On that final judgment day, we will, our Sages teach, be asked a series of six questions.

The first question that God will "ask" us is "Nasata v'natata b'emunah?" – were your monetary dealings conducted faithfully. First and foremost, being an observant Jew means to earn, spend and invest your money ethically. Practices such as not declaring income earned, misleading advertising, improper pricing and mistreating employees means forfeiting one's place among religious Jewry. The Torah understood the deep love people have for money – our Sages declared that almost all of us do some sinning in this area, "cutting corners" in order to have more. Thus, there are more than 120 mitzvot relating to this crucial area of life, guiding us at every turn to a life of honesty and integrity.

The term emunah (faith) is one we normally associate with beliefs and philosophy. It seems out of place when dealing with money. Yet, ultimately, those who are wanting in this area display a lack of faith in God.

"All of one's sustenance for the year is determined between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur." While we are not allowed to rely on miracles and must be engaged in gainful employment, our yearly wages are set by God Himself. Thus, any attempt to circumvent our share and acquire more is an act of trying to outsmart God.

The Jew who has emunah understands that wealth is not meant for everyone, and while it is admirable to try to earn more honestly, to do so dishonestly is an expression of lack of faith in God. Acting ethically in this area is the true expression of faith in God.

UJA: a meaningful voluntary Jewish tax

URBAN WRITER

It's September and that means it's United Jewish Appeal (UJA) time.

I thought this would be a good moment to offer some personal insights into UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the financial and planning backbone of much of the Jewish community and a place where I worked from 1990 to 1997.

I began my career with UJA Federation during Operation Exodus – the campaign to rescue Soviet Jews. It was an electric time and a trophy campaign for UJA. Every morning, we woke up to updates of miraculous rescue operations by Israel, partially funded by UJA dollars, of Jews in Uzbekistan, Azerbaijan and Odessa, as well as chilling reports of potential pogroms by hoodlum groups like Pamyat.

In Toronto, Operation Exodus was hugely successful and raised millions of tzedakah funds to finance our city's portion of a worldwide Jewish fundraising effort to bring these previously captive Jews to Israel.

The campaign was indeed spectacular and a milestone in my life. Two months into my new career, I was working directly with giant Jewish figures such as Baruch Gur, the architect of Operation Exodus in the former Soviet Union itself, and a tireless and creative campaign team directed by then campaign director, and my creative mentor, Mark Gryfe.

Over the years, UJA Federation campaigns have come and gone, each one with its own personality, spirit, successes and foibles. In 1994, the campaign centred on the rescue of the Jewish community of the former Yugoslavia. A couple of years later, following the "peaceful" Rabin-Arafat handshake on the White House lawn, "Continuity" was the campaign's central motif – a bid to look inward and raise money for the innate needs of the Jewish world, not those imposed on us by war.

Throughout history, Jewish communities have instituted a central fund responsible for the welfare, education and basic needs of the Jewish community – especially its most vulnerable members, such as widows, orphans and the elderly.

UJA Federation is exactly that. It is a professionally run entity that raises vast amounts of dollars from relatively few donors, and it's generally the first place institutions and individuals seek out when they need financial assistance.

UJA Federation is not perfect. Its platinum list of recipient agencies and programs (such as women's shelters) in Toronto, Canada, North America and Israel is generally a well-kept secret. In recent years, federation leadership has started to increase its understanding of the needs of some traditionally under-served corners of our community, and to work equitably and warmly with other organizations – but it still has a way to go.

At the end of the day, UJA Federation is key to the maintenance and enhancement of the Toronto Jewish community, and our tzedakah relationship with Israel. On a personal note, I am grateful for the education I received on community work and the opportunity to work with Jewish leaders such as Dan Meridor, Ehud Barak, Yitzchak Shamir and a plethora of solid Toronto Jewish community members.

In 5765, donate to United Jewish Appeal.

If you are not a supporter, make sure your reasons are based on fact. Most non-supporters I have found over the years, base their decision not to contribute on old grudges or misinformation, such as exaggerated administrative costs or alleged preferences for funding one denomination over another.

Ask questions. Investigate, and you will likely find that UJA Federation allocations have touched almost every local individual and family, regardless of their affiliation. You will also discover that the federation is well-run and is imperative for the well-being of Jews in Toronto, Canada and Israel.

From 1990 to 1997, I worked at UJA Federation, and I still passionately believe in it. I figure that must mean something.

Shanah Tovah.

Carnage in Be'er Sheva

Suicide terrorists bombed two buses last week in Be'er Sheva, killing 16 people and wounding more than 80. A three-year-old boy was among the murdered. Here we see passersby lending emergency aid to one of the wounded. Hamas claimed responsibility for the atrocities. Please see related story on page 54.

Atomic Betty's teenage voice

Tajja Isen

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Singer and actress Tajja Isen is a showbiz veteran – and she's only 13.

The Thornhill, Ont., native, who made her mark on a Judy and David CD and then as Young Nala in the Toronto production of Disney's The Lion King, is starring in the title role of the new animated show, Atomic Betty, from Atomic Cartoons/Breakthrough Films and Television and TeleImages France. The show airs nationwide on Teletoon, weekdays at 5:30 pm.

Isen is no stranger to voice animation. She was Sister Bear in the Nelvana-PBS animated series, Berenstain Bears, and was the title voice in Nelvana's animated feature, Heidi. She also appeared in other animated series, including Braceface, Franny's Feet, Jacob Two Two and Zoe Kezako.

"Atomic Betty is a sweet, brainy little girl," Isen explains. "She has a secret identity as Atomic Betty – defender of the cosmos. Her commander, Admiral DeGill (Adrian Truss) – he's a little fish – sends her signals on her charm bracelet. When she receives the signals, she makes a quick transformation into Atomic Betty to right the wrong somewhere in the galaxy."

Airfares to Israel: critics say too costly

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

From his body language and tone, it's clear Stanley Morais is exasperated by the criticism he's hearing about El Al's pricing policy.

The critics, he explained, may understand their own businesses, but they're woefully unfamiliar with the cutthroat airline industry and its debilitating cost structure. Referring to stories in the business press that he's clipped, he points out that many large carriers are teetering on the brink of bankruptcy and that El Al is finally turning the corner financially.

For their part, El Al's critics say the airline's fares are too high, so high in fact they are preventing potential tourists from visiting Israel.

Down the street from El Al's Bloor Street offices, Dani Shahal of the Israel Government Tourism Office (IGTO) is also exasperated, though for completely different reasons. He's convinced that if El Al moderated its prices, more tourists would flock to Israel.

Meanwhile, in the northern reaches of Toronto, Ehud Telem shares a similar view. Telem operates Peerless Travel, one of the country's largest bookers of flights and vacation packages to Israel.

News in Brief

CANADA

Local Leader Dies

OTTAWA — Lawyer and philanthropist Hyman Soloway, a longtime leader of Ottawa's Jewish community, died of colon cancer July 26. He was 90. At his funeral, attended by hundreds of people, the former president of Ottawa's Vaad Ha'ir, Beth Shalom Synagogue and the Jewish Community Centre, was described by Rabbi Reuven Bulka as "a giant within our community."

ODA President

TORONTO — Dr. Steve Goren has been named to head the Ontario Dental Association (ODA), a 6,300-member voluntary association that represents 80 per cent of Ontario dentists. Goren, a native of Winnipeg, graduated from the University of Manitoba in 1979 and built his practice in the Cabbagetown area of Toronto beginning in 1980. Active on numerous ODA committees, Goren was recently presented with the Service Award for his outstanding contribution to the profession of dentistry.

WORLD

Citizenship Revoked

CHICAGO — A U.S. federal judge revoked the U.S. citizenship of a former Nazi concentration camp guard. The government said Joseph Wittje, 84, who lives in Illinois, served as a guard with the SS Death's Head Guard battalion at Sachsenhausen during the war, and that he lied about his service when he applied for U.S. citizenship in 1959. The Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations, its Nazi-hunting unit, and the U.S. Attorney's Office brought the charges.

University Petitioned

NEW YORK — Activists are urging Duke University to deny the Palestinian Solidarity Movement meeting space for an October conference. Duke officials have said they will not cancel the event, the Chronicle of Higher Education reported. Pro-Israel activists say the Palestinian group supports terrorism, and they are circulating an online petition to convince the university to cancel the event. Last year, the controversial group was forced to move its annual conference to Ohio State University from Rutgers University, in New Jersey, after Rutgers cancelled the conference following widespread protests.

Jewish Temples Considered Targets

OAKVILLE, Ont. — White supremacists discussed shooting Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and blowing up government buildings and Jewish temples in Internet chats intercepted by London, Ont., police, a human rights tribunal was told last week.

The Internet chatroom messages were presented as evidence at a tribunal examining whether former Londoner James Scott Richardson, Torontonian Alexan Kulbashian and two websites, the Canadian Ethnic Cleansing Team and Tri-City Skins.com, violated Canada's anti-hate laws.

The now-defunct sites included jokes about killing blacks, Jews, Muslims and Sikhs.

Richardson and Kulbashian, who deny the allegations, could be liable for $80,000 in fines and damages.

The hearing was prompted by a complaint by Ottawa human rights advocate Richard Warman.

More Proselytizing

SAN DIEGO — Jews for Jesus is targeting San Diego Jews in a proselytizing drive during the High Holy Days. The "Behold Your God" campaign, which will involve about 30 missionaries and cost $100,000, has angered Jewish leaders in the city. A similar two-week campaign was also slated to begin last week in Denver, and another is underway in Washington, D.C. In San Diego, volunteers are planning to go to Jewish neighbourhoods to distribute leaflets, and they plan to use direct-mail and call people at home.

Anti-Semite Honoured

NEW YORK — A Greek composer who said that "Jews are at the root of all evil" is being awarded the Olympiart Prize by the International Olympic Committee. Known for his score for Zorba the Greek, Mikis Theodorakis has explained his remarks by saying of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and U.S. Jews: "I am totally opposed to Sharon's policy and I have stressed this repeatedly, just as I have repeatedly condemned the role of prominent American Jewish politicians, intellectuals and theorists in the shaping of today's aggressive Bush policy."

High Holy Day Help

PHOENIX — A new website, NoMembershipRequired.com, was launched recently to assist in finding an inspirational and understandable High Holy Day service. The site lists High Holy Day services in 50 cities across the United States, many of which don't require payment for tickets or knowledge of Hebrew.

Israeli ambassador attacks UN as hypocritical

UJA Federation launches 2005 campaign

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel's ambassador to the United Nations lambasted that organization last week, accusing it of hypocrisy.

Dan Gillerman suggested that the UN's failure to understand Israel's rationale and right to build a security fence to combat terrorism is a case in point.

In a reference to a recent UN resolution deploring the controversial route of the fence through the West Bank, he expressed amazement that the UN has "put on trial" the victims of terrorism rather than the terrorists themselves.

Speaking at the festive launch of UJA Federation's 2005 campaign, held at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel, Gillerman said that the UN infuriates him because it tolerates human rights violators such as Libya and Syria while singling out for condemnation a democratic state like Israel.

Israel's ambassador to the United Nations, Dan Gillerman, was speaker at UJA Federation's 2005 campaign launch in Toronto.

In a speech that occasionally resembled a pep talk, he laid the blame for Israel's decision to build the barrier at Yasser Arafat's doorstep.

"This fence is the Arafat fence – the fence that Arafat built," he declared, implicitly blaming the president of the Palestinian Authority and chair of the PLO for tolerating and/or encouraging terrorism.

"It will remain as long as Arafat's reign of terror will reign," Gillerman added in a defiant retort

The fence has reduced suicide attacks by 90 per cent, he claimed. But the day after his address, Palestinian bombers, in their first successful strike since last March in Ashdod, killed 15 people and wounded more than 90.

Gillerman explained that Israel is building the fence closer to the pre-1967 border in consideration of a recent Israeli Supreme Court ruling.

Taking note of its verdict, he said Israel is a country that abides by the rule of law.

And in a swipe at a ruling issued by the "biased" International Court of Justice in July condemning the fence's intrusion into the West Bank, Gillerman said it had not influenced the re-routing of the barrier.

Predicting that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon will fulfill his commitments to finish the fence and withdraw unilaterally from the Gaza Strip, he assured his large audience that these moves will "create a new reality of peace and stability" in the Middle East.

"Until then, we must be strong."

Minutes earlier, quoting the late Israeli leader, Golda Meir, Gillerman – a Labour party appointee who presented his credentials in January 2003 – said, "There won't be peace until the Arabs learn to love their children more than they hate us."

Describing the Jewish state as a nation of scientific, technical and cultural achievements, Gillerman asserted that Israel will prevail.

"I promise you that," he said, referring to the current Palestinian uprising.

"A society that has given the world suicide bombers can't prevail over a society that has given the world the Weizman Institute and the UJA."

Although it is at the forefront of the battle against terrorism, Israel continues to thrive.

Jewish unity on Darfur

From the editor's desk

As we witness the continuing inaction of the United Nations in the crisis of Darfur, the harsh condemnations of U.S. policy in Iraq we heard by the UN and by most of its members ring increasingly hollow.

The justification they could not find in Iraq for military intervention, or at least for a strong military presence, screams each day from every newspaper in the West.

Khartoum has not disarmed the Janjaweed militias or stopped their attacks against the black Sudanese refugees.

Yet the collective response of the nations of the world has been the equivalent of "let's not rush into anything, if there is anything we can do at all."

The 30-day deadline imposed by the Security Council on July 30 on the government in Khartoum to end the human rights abuses in Darfur has expired. But the Security Council has not yet acted to enforce its own deadline. Nor will it, because there were no enforcement mechanisms written into the deadline.

Human Rights Watch (HRW), the international human rights advocacy agency, last week issued a scathing criticism of the United Nations for its failure to protect the lives of the Sudanese refugees.

"For the UN Security Council to fail to deliver on its own strong demands sends the worst possible message," HRW said. "There are continuing depredations against civilians in Darfur, including the existence of at least 16 armed Janjaweed (Arab militia) camps terrorizing civilians."

The agency called on the United Nations to "urgently reinforce international observers and troops in Darfur, impose an arms embargo against the Sudanese government, sanctions on military and civilian leaders and launch an international commission of inquiry" to collect evidence of the atrocities committed in Darfur.

But it was not only Human Rights Watch last week that attempted to move the conscience of the world to act to save the human lives that are in danger there.

In a remarkably bold and possibly precedent-setting press release, the Rabbinical Council of America (RCA), the largest group of Orthodox rabbis in the world, also issued a call to action, or, as they described it, a "statement of utmost moral concern... to put an end to the unfolding genocide that threatens the lives of more than a million Africans in the Darfur region of the Sudan."

Uncompromising in its tone, the RCA targeted the U.S. Congress, the UN and the civilized nations of the world, but was aimed primarily at the Jewish people.

"As we approach the High Holiday season in the Jewish calendar, filled with repentance, spiritual introspection and moral resolve, the Rabbinical Council of America calls... especially [upon] the Jewish community, to take immediate steps to put an end to the ongoing murderous ethnic cleansing in Darfur, the Sudan, that bears echoes of the European Holocaust of the 1940s, and more recently the atrocities in Serbia, Bosnia and Rwanda.

"And with full consciousness of the unique place of the Jewish people among the families of humanity as victims of prejudice, bigotry and discrimination, knowing at first hand such appalling suffering inflicted by human beings upon their fellows, we call upon our fellow Jews to take every possible step to ameliorate the suffering of the people of Darfur. Those who are in positions of influence in political circles should, to the best of their ability, ensure that the issue remains at the forefront of our government's agenda. Those who are capable of contributing to the relief effort should make every effort to do so..."

"We declare that the concern for saving innocent human life, no matter its faith, ethnicity or race, is of utmost importance... the Torah world must offer voices of protest against the barbaric actions of the Sudanese government and its agents, as well as prayer for the well-being and salvation of the intended victims, for their sake, and our own, lest we become insensitive to the suffering of these and other human beings... We are indeed our brothers' keepers.

"The time for silence has passed. It is time to speak up. And it is time to act."

All streams of the Jewish community are actively speaking up on behalf of the people in Darfur.

The Union for Reform Judaism last month announced the creation of the Sudan Relief Fund and that it will "work with its coalition partners in the Jewish Coalition for Sudan Relief, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee and the American Jewish World Service to identify the most appropriate recipients of these humanitarian funds."

The United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, too, issued a statement calling upon Conservative Jews to become engaged in the issue.

"We strongly encourage all Conservative Jews to contribute funds to help alleviate the suffering of the Darfur refugees through the Jewish Coalition for Sudan Relief... and to contact their respective government leaders to denounce the killings in Darfur and to advocate for an effective international solution to this crisis."

It is an important, moral example that these religious bodies have set for us. We would be wise to follow it.

COMMEMORATION AT LODZ CEMETERY: As part of a series of events commemorating the 60th anniversary of the liquidation of the Lodz Ghetto in Poland, more than 4,000 people marched from the Lodz Cemetery to the Radegast train station, where thousands of Jews were put on trains destined for the Chelmno death camp. At a special ceremony at the Grand Opera Theatre in Lodz, more than 400 survivors were joined by dignitaries, politicians and Polish citizens to honour those who perished and pay homage to those who survived. Critics say air fares to Israel are too expensive

He finds El Al's prices inexplicable, scandalous even. The inevitable effect, he maintains, is that "it's going to kill tourism to Israel.

"A simple tour for a synagogue, a church [group], used to cost $2,000 to $2,500 [per person]. Now, with Air Canada or El Al, it's $3,000 or more. How many can afford to spend $3,000 for 10 days?" he asked.

"Over the last two years, prices have gone up $500 and it's entirely air." Land costs, hotel, food, touring, is the same or perhaps cheaper, he said.

Telem believes that "El Al has increased its yield on its flights by 50 per cent at least, due to the [rising] Canadian dollar and higher prices."

"The big scandal is that Canadians pay more than anybody else in the world and Canadians pay the price because they have no choice."

Morais is unimpressed with that line of argument. If prices are too high, he asked, why were El Al's peak summer season flights 90 per cent full? What's more, if consumers find El Al's prices too high, they have other options, including Air Canada, which flew to Israel seven times per week during the summer, a charter flight as well as other international carriers that stop in Europe en route to Tel Aviv and whose fares, at times during the year, are cheaper than El Al's.

Airlines that offer such service use a "hub and spoke" model, in which aircraft arrive and depart from a central location. Frankfurt, Germany, serves as Lufthansa's hub, with passengers transferring through the airport en route to such destinations as Lodz and Cracow, he noted.

El Al, for its part, operates as a point-to-point airline, with passengers flying from Toronto to Tel Aviv non-stop in 10½ hours. With no European layover, the price passengers pay reflects that premium service, Morais said.

From Shahal's perspective, as Israel's consul for tourism and director of the IGTO, every effort must be made to attract visitors to Israel. Although August was a good month for the tourism industry in the Jewish state, and the preceding seven months saw a 58 per cent increase in visitors over the same period the year before, overall that sector has been hurting.

"We support El Al, the national airline of Israel, but El Al can carry [more] passengers. We have facilities and hotels in Israel that are dying," Shahal said.

Shahal believes price is the main deterrent. "I've heard from people that they can't afford to fly because of the prices. In Israel, the land arrangements, the hotels and other facilities are not relatively expensive compared to the price of the ticket."

Shahal said there is a segment of the travelling public for whom the $1,700 to $1,800 price tag is too expensive.

Comparing the fare charged in New York City to Toronto, Shahal said "depending on the season, there's a gap of a couple of hundred dollars in favour of New York. Why should it be like this?"

Morais said there are numerous factors that go into setting ticket prices. El Al's business model takes into account costs of staff, fuel, landing fees, kosher food, sales and commissions. Travel agents, he pointed out, earn seven per cent commission on flights booked on El Al.

While fares during the summer high season are more expensive, they drop to about $1,300 during the winter. And El Al is offering a number of inexpensive air and hotel packages to Israel in November and December, starting at $1,480, he said.

But it's unrealistic for critics to compare fares out of New York and Toronto, he continued. El Al offers five flights a day out of New York on high-capacity jumbo jets. There's also a lot more competition in New York and the revenue and cost structure are quite different out of JFK Airport, he added.

The critics also don't appreciate that the same product can be priced differently in different markets. Bananas are cheaper in Toronto than in Los Angeles, even though transportation costs to that U.S. city from the tropics are cheaper, Morais said.

As for El Al's routes, an Israeli buying a Tel Aviv-Toronto return ticket won't pay the same as a Canadian buying a Toronto-Tel Aviv round trip. In Israel, the fare costs $1,870 (in equivalent Canadian dollars) while in Canada the price is $1,660 for the same booking class.

"[El Al's] prices are set by discussions with head office with regard to the classes of service, costs, what the market will bear, competition and, for El Al, the long-term serviceability of this route," Morais said.

El Al's security costs are higher than other airlines, while the cost of fuel has increased by 66 per cent since April 2003, he noted.

Morais said the Tel Aviv-Toronto-Los Angeles route does not make money and represents only a very small percentage of the airline's overall traffic. About 35,000 passengers are expected to fly the route in 2004 out of El Al's total passenger traffic of 1.3 million.

Morais believes there is room to improve Canadian traffic, but shifting the price point isn't the way to do it. Price stability must be maintained. "For us to sell in the long term below our costs puts the route in jeopardy," he said.

Morais said he is constantly making the case with head office for maintaining the route and he notes that about half of the passenger traffic consists of Israelis booking in Tel Aviv. Though it isn't a money-maker, Toronto remains an important destination for Israelis and dropping it could lose the airline repeat business, he suggested.

Morais noted the airline will become fully privatized in December, and it will be successful only if it runs on a sound business basis. El Al, which ceased to be a government-controlled company on June 6, earned $7 million (all figures US) in the second quarter of 2004 after registering a $28.8 million loss for the same period the year before.

Walk to raise funds for cancer radiation treatments

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Shortly after Jennifer Zelovitzky coordinated a charity walk to raise funds for cancer radiation treatments, her sister Lisa Coristine, who was battling cancer, gave her a thank-you card.

The card expressed gratitude for "creating something good out of everything that was bad," Zelovitzky said. She kept it tucked neatly in her purse for years.

In June, when Zelovitzky would normally have been planning the annual walk, she had some doubts about carrying on, after Lisa, an English and history teacher at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, died at the age of 28.

But the card's message served as an inspiration to plan the walk again. "The card reminded me of why we did the walk," she said.

"You can't prevent bad things from happening to you, but Lisa really thought raising money to help other people was a way to use her experience for the greater good."

This year's Lisa Coristine Brave Heart Foundation For a Cure Walk takes place on Sept. 26 at G. Ross Lord Park. Registration is at 9 a.m. and the walk kicks off at 10 a.m., wrapping up with a barbecue and prizes.

Proceeds from the five-kilometre trek will support a chair in Intensity Modulated Radiation Therapy and Biologically Adapted Radiation Therapy at Princess Margaret Hospital.

These forms of targeted radiation, which has many debilitating side effects, aim to focus only on the cancerous cells.

"What this would ultimately do is allow higher doses of radiation to be used for shorter periods of time, while hopefully leaving the healthy cells alone," said Zelovitzky, who is co-ordinating the walk along with her sister Katie Coristine.

Over the last two years, the walk has raised more than $100,000 and drawn hundreds of participants.

The fundraising format has gone high-tech this year, with registration for the walk and pledging done online.

Registered fundraisers can send out mass e-mails to prospective donors, who then click on a link that automatically draws them to the fundraisers' personalized web page, said Donna Reddy, special event manager at Princess Margaret Hospital. "It makes things so much easier."

After seeing a fundraiser's web page, which includes a target goal along with a personalized message and/or picture, a donor can submit a pledge online with a credit card and receive a tax receipt instantly by e-mail.

Fundraisers can keep tabs of who sponsors them by looking at a running list of pledges that is tracked online.

Reddy said hard-copy pledge forms are also available online.

The pledging is linked with the ilovere wards.com program, through which points earned from money raised can be redeemed for prizes.

"Our top prize this year for the top collector is a 24-inch Sony flat-screen TV," Zelovitzky said. "We're going to have prizes for all of the top collectors."

Zelovitzky wishes Lisa could join in the walk, but says she will be there in spirit. "I think she will be there. It represents her in so many ways."

For more information log onto https://secure.e2rm.com/registrant/LoginRegister.aspx?EventID=1283&Lang Pref=en-CA or contact Reddy at Princess Margaret Hospital at 416-946-4574.

UJA FEDERATION CAMPAIGN 2005
A VOICE IN THE WORLD

Bernie Farber, Executive Director Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region (left) surveys cemetery damage with Ontario Attorney General Michael Bryant (centre) and Toronto police chief Julian Fantino.

A Campaign to Protect Our Community

Your support for UJA Federation Campaign 2005, now underway, will help to protect our own Jewish community against future outbreaks of antisemitism. A special UJA Federation task force, which is currently reviewing security at community facilities, will be recommending new measures and Campaign 2005 will provide the funds to implement them. Campaign 2005 is an urgent Action Plan for a safe Jewish future at a time when worldwide antisemitism has reached alarming levels.

When your canvasser calls, please support this critical campaign to strengthen our voice in the world.

CAMPAIGN 2005 ACTION PLAN

- Providing enhanced security for community institutions
- Speaking out forcefully on urgent Jewish issues
- Building a stronger Israel
- Empowering a new generation to deal with hatred

Murderous acts, all of a piece

Last week, Islamic fundamentalist terrorists waded ankle-deep, again, in the blood of innocents, which they zealously spilled into the muck of their hatred. In the calculus of their malevolent contempt, the functions of brutality, sadism and killing were fully engaged, as they slaughtered civilians in Iraq, Russia and Israel.

In Iraq, 12 Nepalese men working at menial jobs in Baghdad were summarily executed, one beheaded, ostensibly because they were assisting the foreign forces on Iraqi soil. And as of this writing, the fate of the two French journalists being held captive in Iraq by the fundamentalists was unknown. The revolutionary fighters hide behind masks when they explain the religious and political justifications for their acts. But they hide only their faces, the least important aspects of who they are. The rest is known: they are opposed to foreign – read free, democratic, western-style – government taking root in Iraq.

In Russia, the Islambouli Brigades of Al Qaeda exploded two passenger planes killing some 90 passengers and then bombed a subway in Moscow killing nine more people. Late last week, terrorists wearing the suicide bomb belt signature apparel of their Arab Islamist cohorts attacked an elementary school in the city of Beslan in the south of Russia. As of this writing, seven children were reported dead and 180 wounded.

In Be'er Sheva, 16 people were killed and nearly 100 wounded when suicide bombers struck two buses. Hamas proudly claimed credit for the murders and for the murderers. Despite the usual equivocal condemnation of the killings expressed to the western world by Palestinian Authority (PA) spokesman Saeb Erekat, the official PA daily Al Hayat Al Jadida more tellingly celebrated the two men as having achieved the status of shahada (holy martyrdom) for spilling Jewish blood, thus meriting great rewards in the afterlife.

Israel has accused Hamas officials in Damascus of sending the two suicide bombers to their grisly tasks. It has also warned Syria that it will be held to account for sheltering the terrorists.

These murderous acts, though, conducted so very far apart from each other, are all of a piece, connected in the minds and hearts of the perpetrators as lawful, holy war against unlawful and unholy enemies: westernized Jews, Christians and our allies.

The free world must fight these uniquely cruel terrorists. There is no immunity from their holy war. To believe otherwise is delusional.

But the fight will be won only if:

- all threatened societies join forces;
- there is no appeasement; and
- non-fundamentalist, non-violent Muslims around the world see the fight as their fight also.

Canada's responsibility is quite clear, too. Protect our values of freedom and democracy against the forces intent on harming them.

CIJA clarifications

We wish to clarify two points that appeared in the recent article about CIJA ("CIJA officials look back on first year," CJN, Aug. 26).

CIJA-PAC is a non-partisan, grassroots organization aimed at engaging the Jewish community in the democratic process. As currently constituted, CIJA-PAC only engages in non-partisan activities. As such, it has interviewed leaders of the three major political parties during the recent federal election, prepared candidate and volunteer guides, by drawing upon materials from other CIJA organizations, and trained community members in how to participate as volunteers in the democratic process.

CIJA-PAC also regularly polls its members on issues of importance and shares the findings broadly with community leadership. In addition, it offers specialized educational opportunities for its members to learn more about critical issues affecting Israel and the quality of Jewish Life.

A second point refers to the CIJA budget. The total budget, which is funded through the generous support of the federations and regional communities, has been substantially expanded to $10 million on an annual basis for a three-year period.

Edna Schwartz recalled

Your article on Rose Schwartz Park ("Rose Schwartz Park opens in New Waterford," CJN, Aug. 12) was very interesting since I used to do business with Harold Schwartz and his clothing stores. But a very important part of the family was left out. His sister and Rose's daughter, Edna Schwartz, opened a store here in Toronto on Bloor Street in the Colonnade. She was an outstanding merchandiser and participated in many charities, such as the UJA. Unfortunately, she died too young. But she left her mark on women's retail in this city. She is still missed.

Wants a showpiece museum

I have read about a $250-million project for the Jews of the Greater Toronto Area ("The future face of Jewish Toronto," CJN, May 13). Nowhere, however, have I heard or read anything about the establishment of a proper, presentable Holocaust Museum, Jewish Canadian Military Museum or Jewish Museum in the Greater Toronto Area.

I am appalled that nothing has appeared in your newspaper pertaining to such buildings that could be showpieces for the Jewish community and also for Canada. We appear to have hundreds of millions of dollars for everything else.

Silver culture medal 1948

The article recalling the exploits of Jewish Olympians ("Jewish medal winners highlighted in Jews and the Olympics," CJN, Aug. 5) has relevance to my experience. The 1948 London Olympics also awarded medals in the cultural division. My Divertimento for Flute and Strings won the silver medal (the highest award) in the chamber music category.

Shuk done in by deluge

Due to inclement weather and unsafe conditions, regretfully, we were forced to make the decision to postpone this year's Shuk in the Park.

On behalf of the entire Shuk in the Park committee, I would like to extend our heartfelt thanks to all of the dedicated volunteers and devoted patrons who made their way to the Shuk in the Park despite the heavy rain.

We are currently making alternative arrangements for a future date, and hope to see everyone for a day of fun at our Israeli marketplace in the heart of Toronto. Please visit www.shukinthepark.com regularly for updates.

Our own worst enemies

Today, I read with horror (yet once again) that 16 innocent souls lost their lives and about 100 suffered from injuries because of the horrific twin terrorist attacks in Be'er Sheva.

Today, there were also protests in New York City against U.S. President George W. Bush. Many of the protesters are Jewish, and they march hand in hand with those who advocate hatred toward Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and the State of Israel.

My tummy is in knots when I read about it in the news. Even after the despicable terror attacks that took place, there are Jewish organizers who would like to cause an outpouring of more civil disobedience in New York. They are against the war in Iraq. They do not mention that former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein, who gave $25,000 to the family of each suicide bomber, is no longer in power. There are some Jews who are their own worst enemies. It is not only sad; it is a charpe and a shande.

New York and its Jewish voters

For some people, New York is the least American part of the United States. The writer Ford Madox Ford's 1927 travel book was titled New York Is Not America, and the phrase is frequently heard across the country. But for Jews, New York is America; indeed it is the heart of their America.

When I was a young child growing up in Montreal, the terms "America," "United States" and "New York" were, I thought, synonymous. Harry Golden called New York "the greatest Jewish city in the world." Not coincidentally, it has always been identified with liberal causes, and even today registered Democrats outnumber Republicans five to one.

Yet the city's current mayor, Michael Bloomberg, a Jewish Republican, welcomed the Republican national convention to Manhattan this year. It will be interesting to see whether this translates into more Jewish votes for U.S. President George W. Bush in November.

'May you be like a lamp: hang by day, burn by night'

By ESTHER HECHT

Sure, you can tell your enemies to "drop dead!" But it's so much more delicious to use a Yiddish curse, like this anatomical organ-twister: "May your liver come out of your nostrils piece by piece."

Or try this fiery blast: "May you be like a lamp: hang by day, burn by night and be snuffed out in the morning."

Yiddish has a cornucopia of ways to wish your enemies stricken by the plague or hauled off by the Angel of Death, and hardly a one invokes unmentionable parts of the anatomy.

"The maledictions in the Old Testament are really horrible," Yiddish dictionary writer Yosef Guri said in an interview in his Jerusalem home, referring especially to Leviticus 26:14-45 and Deuteronomy 28: 15-68.

"But not so in Yiddish, [where] they are the result of a momentary outburst of anger, a way of blowing off steam," he said.

Guri has written one of the surprise hits of the publishing season, Let's Hear Only Good News: A Dictionary of Yiddish Blessings and Curses (Hebrew University Magnes Press). It's been on the Ha'aretz non-fiction bestseller list for three months, a delicious irony given that public use of Yiddish was once frowned upon in the Jewish state.

Dan Benovici, director of Magnes Press, which distributes the dictionaries, knew he was on to a good thing when Guri's 2000 Idiomatic Expressions in Yiddish appeared in 2002. It sold three times as many copies as other Magnes books.

"It's in small bites, and that makes it easier for the general audience to digest," Benovici said.

But he was taken by surprise when the new dictionary sold nearly 5,000 copies – 10 times the Magnes average – in just four months.

Benovici attributes the success to the piquant content and the fact that the first review appeared on the website of a popular Israeli daily, attracting intense media interest.

"A sociologist should write about this phenomenon," said Guri, expressing wonder at the fact that even non-Ashkenazi shopkeepers in the city of Kfar Saba are buying the book and sharing it with their employees.

These colloquial curses – the creations of Jews who lived in eastern Europe – are not meant to evoke horror in the person to whom they are directed, according to Guri, 72.

"In the same way as a [Yiddish] blessing does not create a new reality, neither does a curse," he said. "It has no magic power."

Instead, wit is the essence of the Yiddish curse, said Guri, who has collected 450 of them in his new book, whose success has rekindled interest in his other dictionaries.

The great 19th-century Yiddish humorist Sholom Aleichem noted the passion for wit of the Jews of Kasrilevke, the fictitious eastern European town that was the setting of his stories.

"They would walk a mile for a good joke," Guri said. "For a witticism, they'd give away their mother and father."

In fact, when Jews gathered, they would engage in one-upmanship in reciting colourful curses, Guri said. Small wonder then that they came up with a curse that sounds like a composite menu of several festive meals: "May you every day eat chopped liver with onions, herring, chicken soup with matzah balls, carp with horseradish, roast beef with tsimmes, pancakes and tea with lemon – and may you choke on every bite."

Sholom Aleichem was the first compiler of Yiddish curses, according to Guri. At the age of 13, he secretly wrote down the imprecations that poured from his stepmother's mouth and arranged them in a kind of catalogue. Thus, for example, under "writing" he listed "writing prescriptions," shorthand for: "May the only thing anyone ever writes you be a prescription."

Others have followed Aleichem in collecting Yiddish curses. Guri's book is one of a rapidly growing number of works on this theme and on a language many people believed dead.

Guri, a professor emeritus of Slavic studies at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, acknowledges that he stands on the shoulders of earlier scholars, including the late Nahum Stutchkoff, compiler of the Thesaurus of the Yiddish Language and author of radio dramas that reflected life in New York tenements in the 1930s and '40s.

But Guri's work is unique in alphabetizing the curses, organizing them by category and offering translations from the Yiddish to English, Russian and Hebrew. It is one of a series of dictionaries he has produced of Yiddish idiomatic expressions, the keys to a rich secular literature that includes translations of Balzac, Pushkin and Shakespeare.

It's no surprise that the blessings are tamer than the curses. A particularly colourful one, "May he hiccup a lot," is said in relation to a dead person. It expresses the hope that he will be remembered; according to folk belief, a person hiccups when his name is mentioned.

Though Yiddish curses have their own unique linguistic twists, they share some characteristics with curses in other languages.

"Wishing illness and death on one's antagonist is common," but it is especially so in Yiddish and Dutch, said Reinhold Aman, a California-based philologist and longtime publisher of Maledicta, The International Journal of Verbal Aggression.

But there are great differences, too. Some languages – Japanese, for example – pale in comparison to Yiddish when it comes to curses.

"People simply don't curse in Japanese," said Tsuguya Sasaki, a philologist in Kobe, Japan, who has studied and taught Yiddish. "Ordinary native speakers of Japanese have less than a couple of fixed expressions at their disposal. I know only one, which I heard in my childhood."

Curses in other languages differ from Yiddish in both content and style, according to Aman: Anglo-Saxon cultures prefer insults dealing with excrement and body parts, Catholic countries are partial to blasphemy, and cultures of the Middle and Far East go for ancestor insults.

Yiddish curses, meanwhile, have a baroque splendour, as in, "May you own a hundred houses, and each house have 100 rooms, and each room have 100 beds – and may cholera throw you from bed to bed to bed!"

Since Jews were steeped in the Bible and the Talmud, as well as other Jewish lore, these became ready sources for curses. Guri's collection includes, "May your bones be broken as often as the Ten Commandments" and "May you have Pharaoh's curses decorated with Job's boils."

But the Jewish society in which these curses developed was not as aggressive as it is now, said the soft-spoken Guri, who removed a mention of the Messiah from the cover of his book because he feared it would offend some people. "There are no proverbs about killing or guns, though these exist in other cultures," he said.

The Jews of eastern Europe were aware of their physical weakness in relation to their generally hostile, and threatening, neighbors, and even joked about it, but they were certain of their intellectual superiority, Guri said. Perhaps that is what lies behind the clever curse, "May you be healthy and tough as iron, so much so that you cannot bend over."

Cursing violated Jewish ethics, especially when the malediction was directed at another Jew, Guri said. "But Jews had so many troubles, they needed catharsis, so they used euphemisms to get around the unwritten prohibition."

Thus, "May you have ritual-purification water [that is, for a corpse] poured over you" became a way of saying – and not saying – "drop dead!" One could also add the word "not," as is often done in colloquial American English, to get around the prohibition, as in, "May a pain not enter you."

Best of all, one could wish on one's enemy the greatest blessings – and the total inability to enjoy them: "May you have the juiciest goose, but no teeth; the best wine, but no sense of taste; the most beautiful wife, but no virility."

Guri's book is available through the Ideal Book Store (idealbooks@aol.com) and J. Biegeleisen, both in New York, or from Magnes Press (www.magne spress.huji.ac.il).

Defining moments

The most difficult decisions in life aren't between right and wrong. Ethical decisions are easy. Yes, we often fail and make the wrong choice. But even in moments of moral weakness, at least we know what was supposed to be the right choice.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

The truly difficult choices in life are between right and right. There are times when there are too many good options. The Supermom, running from demanding job to carpool to the gym to volunteer work, has to reconsider her priorities on a daily basis. Should she take out clients for dinner, take her kids swimming or go to a charitable function? These "all good choices" decisions are difficult to make, because whatever you end up doing, you feel guilty for having overlooked something important.

Because the "all good choices" decisions leave us feeling guilty, we try to avoid them. We'll run ourselves ragged doing everything so we don't have to choose. Then, when we're finally exhausted, we'll choose in an impulsive fashion. If we're feeling insecure about work, we'll work late; insecure about family, we'll run home early; insecure about our contributions to society, we'll go to more community meetings than we can handle. But we are so uncomfortable with these decisions, we rarely think about them in a comprehensive fashion. And that's a shame, because these choices offer us an opportunity to truly define ourselves.

Joseph L. Badaracco Jr., in his book Defining Moments: When Managers Must Choose Between Right and Right, notes that the decisions between right and right are our truly defining moments. We have many deeply rooted values, and how we prioritize them defines who we are.

That is why the "all good choices" decisions are so important. We cannot simply decide to be "good people." We must also follow choices that reflect our own personal mission.

There is a wonderful anecdote about the chassidic Reb Zushe. He explained to his students that after you die and appear before God for judgment, God doesn't ask you why you weren't like Moses or Abraham. Rather, God asks you, "Why weren't you Zushe?"

Reb Zushe is teaching us the importance of having an authentic identity. God didn't make us to be like everyone else. Each of us is supposed to be our own "Zushe" (or "Chaim," or whatever your name may be).

Our job is not to imitate the success of others, but rather to discover our own unique mission in this world.

It is during defining moments that we can best discover ourselves. We have to choose not only what is right, but what is right for ourselves. Instead of trying to be everything to everybody, these moments allow us to find out who "Zushe" really is.

A Jerusalem summer

Whenever we allow the Palestinian question to define Israel or Zionism, we grant Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat a victory he does not deserve.

This is not to endorse pie-in-the-sky or head-in-the-sand approaches. We must learn about Israel's challenges, Palestinian and otherwise. But a real relationship with the Jewish state demands a more balanced conversation than the one currently taking place among Jews, let alone reporters, politicians or diplomats.

Gil Troy in Montreal

This summer, optimism returned to the streets of Jerusalem, thanks to the strategy of hunting terrorists in their home base, building a fence to keep them out, and mobilizing soldiers, security guards and citizens to stop potential mass murderers.

This summer, the boom-boom-boom occasionally punctuating the cool Jerusalem evenings sent Jerusalemites scurrying to view fireworks that enveloped the Old City walls in colourful blues, yellows, reds and whites.

This summer, the Moment Café, ravaged by terrorists in 2002, battled the Israeli tax authorities rather than Palestinian murderers – while its frustrated owner nobly refused donations from strangers, saying, "I don't want charity; come for dinner instead."

This summer, Steve Averbach, a father of four paralyzed by a suicide bomber he tried to stop in May 2003, returned home, defying predictions he would never leave the hospital.

This summer, tears of pride flowed as Israel's first gold medalist sang Hatikvah in Athens, and his mother boasted on national TV that he got the words right.

For my family, summertime in Jerusalem meant guaranteed sunny days, with appropriately sympathetic sighs for our rain-soaked friends in Montreal. It meant attending bar and bat mitzvahs in creative settings – a kibbutz, the Western Wall excavations, the Israel Museum and Neot Kedumim, a site on which every Biblical plant is cultivated.

Summertime in Jerusalem meant sampling Ramah's Jerusalem Day Camp, with its charming spirit and beautiful values; the YMCA's sports camp, with Arabs, Jews and Christians united by a love of basketball and soccer; and the Ein Yael "Biblical Village," with its creative crafts, set in a 3,200-year-old farm.

Summertime in Jerusalem meant distributing goodies to security guards – the often overlooked invisible army protecting Israelis.

One long, sweaty Friday morning was spent pondering with our nine-year-old daughter her question: "Why is it easier to make mischief than do mitzvot?" Our seven-year-old son played the 17 songs of his Suzuki music "Book One," fiddling at a park overlooking the Old City. Our four-year-old scampered atop the Old City walls, joyfully confusing the Romans and the British, proudly pointing to every spot as being the place where Abraham prepared to sacrifice Isaac and where Solomon the Wise built the Temple. Our two-year-old daughter learned to say bakasha, a toddler version of the song B'vakasha and "please," while bastardizing with equal glee the song Salaam, with its hopeful lyrics, "Peace will soon come."

Summertime in Jerusalem exposed us to some of the performance artists populating the city – the rabbi who hosts dozens at his home every Shabbat meal; the British teacher who delightedly introduces the uninitiated to chassidic tishes, the Friday-night gatherings where hundreds of Mea Shearim Chassidim sing until 4 a.m. Summertime in Jerusalem meant chanting with these Chassidim one night; chanting with thousands of Betar Yerushalayim soccer fans the next night.

Summertime in Jerusalem was about starlit concerts and dinners, about contemplating how to convey the beauty of Israel in a conversation with 40 Canadian Birthright Israel students and a dozen Israeli soldiers, who learned that they are not alone – and are fighting not just for their homeland but for the Jewish people.

Israel has defeated Arafat's war to destroy the Jewish state by combining military might, creative strategizing and true grit. Friends of Israel need to defeat Arafatism through an equally effective combination of political power, creative education and a truer understanding of this modern miracle by the Mediterranean – acknowledging its flaws but also its strengths.

This year, in schools and in shuls, on campus and in the media, let's reject Arafat's caricature, while engaging with the Israel people, experience and love.

And this year, let's visit Israel, so that each of us can attest to the beauty of the land, the vitality of the society, the spirit of the people, and the alluring, enduring peace of Jerusalem.

New year, new message

A rabbi friend has the custom of changing her outgoing voicemail message for the month of Tishrei: "New year, new message. Leave yours!"

I know what she wants: the prosaic name, number and a short message. Still, it's the season, and everyone seems to be giving, getting or sending a "message." I can't help but hear in that recording a challenge – perhaps for something spiritual or ethical, profound and deeply meaningful.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Wherever you look, mixed messages abound. Pop divas sport red threads around their dainty wrists, scan Hebrew words they can't read, acquire new Hebrew names. But their clothing, MTV videos and lifestyles remain much the same. Ordinary Jews encounter mystical Eastern traditions. A very few make arduous pilgrimages, take on the discipline of daily meditation or asceticism. Many simply add a sprinkling of dharma and karma and enlightenment to their vocabulary, and go on with business as usual.

I suppose it's my rationalist roots that make me skeptical of spiritual leaps. My grandfather lived in a chassidic neighbourhood in Williamsburg, Brooklyn, but was a staunch mitnaged (one who opposed Chassidism) all his life. For a few short years before and until just after my birth, my parents lived in an apartment directly beneath his. Through sheer proximity, I absorbed his unequivocal rationalist leaning. Still, the general neighbourhood atmosphere that I basked in during my months of gestation must have exerted an influence, too, because I have a soft spot for seekers, those whose spiritual yearnings lead them down paths no one would have predicted. I respect the possibility of encountering the divine in ways that mystics write about. The seasonal liturgy heightens this feeling, replete with vivid metaphors for the mysteries of creation and end of days, for divine judgment and human accountability.

For those of us who traffic in both the world of religion and the world of politics, the best we can strive for is to bring into the civic arena a set of ethics finely honed by religious learning and sensibility. At worst, we risk imposing our own beliefs on others, or, as my husband, Jonathan Richler, once wrote, mistaking God's prerogatives for our own.

Recently, I saw an anti-abortion protest staged in front of the Holocaust museum in Washington. Graphic placards likened Anne Frank to an aborted fetus, and Jewish abortionist doctors to Josef Mengele and other Nazis. The mixture of anti-Semitism and misogyny was shocking. Still, placards are better than shooting doctors in cold blood.

Lifestyle and placards deliver a "message;" so does money. One prominent feature of High Holy Day services in almost every synagogue is the appeal for charitable donations. Liturgically, the link is clear: after we review the possible fates that may await us in the coming year, we hear the pronunciation that repentance, prayer and charity can avert the harsh decree (or, as some translate, the harshness of the decree). It's in the interest of the giver to give. Pragmatically, the attendance at High Holy Day services dictates the timing of the appeal. The full corpus of synagogue members, holiday guests and the "unaffiliated" are all potential donors.

What synagogues raise funds for is part of the message they convey. This includes ways to enrich and deepen the Jewish experience – one's own and others' – as well as support for Israel's continued development and aspirations for peace, and support of beleaguered Jewish communities worldwide. Many synagogues support local social welfare programs such as food banks and soup kitchens, shelters for the homeless or the abused. Synagogues often reach out further, taking from the Jewish experience and contributing to the global village – for example, by offering humanitarian aid to victims of catastrophe and oppression.

Recent demographic surveys indicate that Jewish philanthropists have fanned outward: rather than funding exclusively or primarily Jewish institutions or Jewish causes, Jewish donors are as likely to contribute to the arts, to political and social causes, to scientific or medical research. While some people see in this phenomenon a weakening of Jewish identity, it is more properly evidence of a complex play of identity and value, a radiating out of principles learned in Jewish communities – a Jewish message, if you will, widely broadcast. New year, new message. Leave yours!

The Kirshner File

Iran's quest for nuclear arms alarms Israel

Next week, at its board of governors meeting in Vienna, the International Atomic Energy Agency is expected to release a damning report on Iran's nuclear activities.

The highly anticipated report is likely to rebuke Iran, which has repeatedly threatened to launch a pre-emptive strike against Israel's reactor in Dimona should Israel attack Iran's nuclear sites. If, in fact, the IAEA condemns Iran, the United States may well send the IAEA's case to the United Nations Security Council, which can impose sanctions. There is no talk at present in Washington of taking military action against Iran, given the mess the United States finds itself in in neighbouring Iraq.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Rich in oil and gas, Iran claims that its nuclear program is strictly for peaceful purposes and manifestly designed to generate electricity. But the IAEA – as well as the United States, the European Union, Canada and Israel – remains skeptical.

Three months ago, the IAEA reported that Iran has reneged on a promise to suspend its nuclear program and is continuing to make parts and materials that could be used in the manufacture of nuclear weapons. Shortly afterward, the IAEA, in a resolution sponsored by France, Britain and Germany, lambasted Iran for its lack of co-operation in disclosing the details of its nuclear program.

That resolution made two telling points. First, Iran has been cagey as to where it obtained blueprints and parts for advanced centrifuges. These machines produce weapons-grade uranium, without which an atomic bomb cannot be built. Second, Iran has been hampering the efforts of IAEA inspectors to examine its suspected facilities.

Mohammed El Baradei, the director of the IAEA, called on Iran to clear up the lingering questions. Interestingly enough, two of the countries that usually defend Iran, Russia and China, conspicuously distanced themselves from the Iranians in this instance.

Last April, before the IAEA slapped Iran on the wrist, French president Jacques Chirac criticized Tehran for violating the spirit of an agreement with France, Germany and Britain to curtail its nuclear program. Under the accord, signed in October 2003 after months of tough negotiations, Iran pledged to suspend its quest to enrich its stocks of uranium – a preliminary step in the production of a nuclear device – in exchange for a package of economic incentives.

Iran has assured the world that it has no reason to be suspicious about its nuclear ambitions. "Iran has not violated any of its commitments to international treaties in its nuclear program," Iran's foreign minister, Kamal Kharrazi, declared last month. But his soothing statement was belied by his subsequent disclosure that Iran has resumed work on centrifuges and by a series of revelations that cast grave doubt on Iran's sincerity.

Last year, Kharrazi said Iran will not give up its nuclear program, which has been aided and abetted by Russia, Pakistan and, possibly, China. Last week, Iran's president, Mohammed Khatami, reiterated Kharrazi's assertion.

This past February, Iran acknowledged that it had secretly purchased components for its nuclear program. Its acknowledgement came after a confession by Abdul Qadeer Khan, the founder of Pakistan's nuclear weapons program, that he had provided Iran, among other nations, with the designs and technology to produce fuel for nuclear devices.

In June, Iran dropped two more bombshells. Khatami said Iran was no longer bound by a moral commitment to suspend uranium enrichment, and the foreign ministry insisted that Iran would go on building centrifuges.

Britain's Daily Telegraph reported in late July that Iran had broken the seals on nuclear equipment monitored by IAEA monitors and was once again testing machinery capable of making fissile material for nuclear arms.

In the third week of August, Iran admitted that it could produce weapons-grade uranium within a year and a nuclear weapon by 2007. The director of Israel's military intelligence research department, Gen. Yossi Kuperwasser, had already reached a similar conclusion.

Tehran's apparent desire to join the nuclear club has triggered an escalating war of words between Iran and Israel and prompted the United States to issue dire warnings.

Last December, the commander of the Iranian air force, Gen. Sayed Reza Pardis, said Israel would be "digging its own grave" if it attacked Iran's nuclear infrastructure. He made this comment shortly after Israel's Iranian-born minister of defence, Shaul Mofaz, described Iran's nuclear program as "insufferable" and observed that an operation to destroy its capabilities might be necessary and was under consideration.

Prior to this, Gen. Meir Dagan, the director of the Mossad – Israel's external intelligence agency – said that Iran's nuclear program represented "the biggest threat to Israel's existence since its creation" in 1948.

Since then, in increasingly bitter tit-for-tat exchanges, Israel and Iran have threatened each other.

On July 21, three days after the Sunday Times of London reported that the Israeli air force had completed preparations for a preemptive strike on Iran's Russian-built Bushehr reactor – which is supposed to be operational in 2006 – Gen. Aharon Ze'evi, the head of Israeli military intelligence, told the cabinet that unless Iran is stopped, it will be a nuclear power by 2008.

Iran's foreign minister, Kamal Kharraz

Taking his cue from Ze'evi, Ehud Yatom, a Likud member of Knesset, said, "Israel must destroy the Iranian nuclear facility, just as we did to the Iraqi reactor in 1981." His Labor party colleague, Ephraim Sneh, said, "If the international community continues to show ineffectiveness, Israel will have to consider its next steps – and fast."

On July 25, Sayed Massod Jazayeri, the commander of Iran's Revolutionary Guards, warned that Israel "will be wiped off the face of the earth" if it launches an attack. (Working on the assumption that an Israeli assault is not improbable, Iran has begun making nuclear defence equipment to control the spread of radioactive gases.)

Four days later, Israel conducted a successful test off California's coast of its Arrow-2 anti-missile system, which is programmed to detect, track and shoot down incoming enemy missiles from as far as 500 kilometres away. The Arrow, which is being developed in conjunction with the United States, is designed to counter Iran's Shihab-3 medium-range ballistic missile, which can reach any target in Israel. Iran tested the Shihab-3 this past summer in an attempt to improve its guidance system and upgrade its warhead.

In the aftermath of these developments, Iran's defence minister, Ali Shamkhami, said that Iran may pre-empt Israel if an attack seems imminent. On Aug. 24, Kharrazi said that Iran will retaliate should it be attacked. On Aug. 26, he advised Israel to sign the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Israel has not officially acknowledged its nuclear capability, but it has said that it will not be the first Middle Eastern nation to "introduce" nuclear weapons to the region. Israel has also said that it will dismantle its nuclear arsenal once it achieves peace with all its neighbours, including Iran.

Israeli threats against Iran notwithstanding, Israel's current policy with respect to Iran's nuclear program turns on deterrence and diplomacy rather than military force. In short, Israel is trying to persuade certain countries and institutions to pressure Iran into giving up its nuclear aspirations.

Israel's chief of staff, Gen. Moshe Yaalon, said recently that all diplomatic efforts should be exhausted before Israel considers more drastic steps. As he put it: "Political pressure certainly has potential, just as it worked on Libya." (Last December, Libya, hobbled by UN and American sanctions and eager to rehabilitate its deteriorating economy, renounced weapons of mass destruction and agreed to a regimen of IAEA inspections).

Two months ago, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon told El Baradei that a nuclear-armed Iran poses a danger to world peace. And when Javier Solana – the foreign minister of the European Union – visited Israel, Sharon sounded a similar theme.

Silvan Shalom, Israel's foreign minister, discussed the issue with U.S. officials in a round of meetings in Washington, D.C., recently, and his words did not fall on deaf ears.

President George W. Bush's national security advisor, Condoleezza Rice, said last month that the United States and its allies "cannot allow the Iranians to develop nuclear weapons," and will do whatever they can to block Iran. In June 2003, Bush said that he "will not tolerate the construction of a nuclear weapon" in Iran.

Two years ago, the director of the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency said Iran may be able to produce sufficient fissile material for a nuclear device by the end of this decade. Judging by recent developments, Iran appears to be well on its way toward achieving that objective.

Thornhill woman dies of West Nile virus

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

A 59-year-old Jewish Richmond Hill resident is one of the first Canadians to succumb to West Nile virus this year.

Judy Teperman had gone to Hallandale, Fla., to decorate a condo she and her husband purchased recently.

She was bitten by a mosquito, or mosquitoes, in July, but, like most people, thought nothing of it.

When, in early August, she began showing symptoms – rash, weakness, headache and malaise – she sought medical help. Although she appeared to be recovering, and was scheduled to return to Toronto via air ambulance, she died Aug. 22 in a Florida hospital. Teperman's body was returned to Toronto, and she was buried on the following Tuesday, Aug. 24, at Adath Israel Section of Pardes Shalom cemetery.

Teperman was born and raised in Toronto, said rabbi and personal friend Rabbi Moshe Stern of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation. He described her as a "go to" person. "Everyone went to her for advice and help – even her children's friends. She always had wisdom beyond her years."

He praised her as "a beautiful woman, outside and inside."

She was active in many Jewish organizations and charities, including B'nai Brith. But her real love, Rabbi Stern said, was Israel. She was especially involved with Beit Halochem, the organization that helps disabled Israeli soldiers. "It was her way of helping Israel," he said.

The family, Rabbi Stern said, is shocked and devastated. Besides being a devoted wife, mother and grandmother, he said, she was raising a disabled grandson.

Dr. Donald Low is microbiologist in chief of Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital, who has done considerable research and consulting in the field of infectious diseases. He became particularly prominent during the recent SARS epidemic.

He urged the public not to panic, as Teperman's death "is an extremely rare event." Most mosquitoes, he said, don't carry the virus. Even if you are bitten by one which does, "80 per cent of the time you won't even know it. Only 19 per cent have any obvious symptoms [rash and flu-like symptoms]."

In only a few people, one in 150, are there any serious effects, such as neurological problems and inflammation of the brain. These tend to happen more in older people (this doesn't mean necessarily the elderly, Low stressed) or those with suppressed immune systems or underlying medical conditions.

It is very encouraging, Low said, that while the greatest incidences of West Nile virus were seen two years ago, last year there was much less. He said that he hoped for even fewer cases this year.

That being said, Low warned, as he has several times over the years, that "we must recognize that we face an emerging threat of new infectious diseases. We must respect them."

West Nile virus is spread by a bite from infected mosquitoes, who themselves became infected when they bite a bird with the disease. It cannot be spread from person to person.

> Teperman's death 'is an extremely rare event'

Low suggested what he called a common sense approach to the disease. "Protect yourself from dawn to dusk, when mosquitoes are most active. Get rid of pools of standing water, where they congregate, but realize that your neighbours may not be as particular about it. Cover your arms and legs when you go outside, and use insect repellent."

As yet, there is no way to prevent infection, or much that can be done to really help.

From past experience, Low said, the season for the disease starts in mid-August, and is over by the end of September.

According to the Toronto Public Health Department, there are now three probable cases of West Nile virus in the Greater Toronto Area.

Teperman is survived by her mother, Natalie Sarick; brother Stephen Field and his wife Lynne; husband Irving; children Howard and his wife Laurie; Heather Kleinberg and husband Joel; Rayn Clements and husband Michael; and Leanna; and seven grandchildren.

Heschel principal celebrates her bat mitzvah

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Instead of the usual bat mitzvah invitation, in which parents invite family and friends to hear a child read from the Torah, Gail Baker's bat mitzvah invitation read a little differently.

"I am pleased to invite you to the bat mitzvah of my wife and our mother Gail Lynn…"

And so on a Thursday morning in June, when Baker stepped up to read the Torah for the first time, she had an audience of not only her family and friends but also 320 elementary school students and their teachers. As the principal and one of the founders of the Toronto Heschel School, Baker had invited all her students to watch and participate in the morning service.

But the morning had a double meaning. It was also Baker's 50th birthday, and the bat mitzvah ceremony was her present to herself because she did not have a bat mitzvah when she was younger.

The bat mitzvah – like any other – came about after months of planning. Last fall, she remembers thinking, "Gee, I should do something to mark my birthday." She saw it fell on a Thursday – the day the Torah is read – and instantly decided to celebrate the milestone in an unconventional way.

"I figured I was turning 50 and I wanted to do something. It was a Thursday morning. What could be better?" she says. "I wanted to challenge myself in a way that was meaningful to me," she adds later.

Gail Baker

For several months, Baker studied her Torah portion with Marlee Pinsker, who is the preschool coordinator and a senior kindergarten teacher at the Toronto Heschel School. Meanwhile, the students practiced the songs they would sing at the ceremony, and family was recruited to participate in the service.

When the big day arrived, Baker's parents, sons and aunts and uncles sat in the front rows of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am, while the students and teachers filled the rest.

Students lead the prayer service and sang on the bimah. Baker read the Maftir, the silver Torah pointer trembling as she sang. ("I realized when I was doing the Maftir that there was silence in a room full of kids," she laughs.) At the end of the ceremony, the teachers pulled Baker and her 90-year-old aunt into a spontaneous dance on the bimah.

Baker acknowledges that having a bat mitzvah at 50 isn't easy. Her family was surprised when she first told them that she wanted one. They wondered how she would have time to prepare for a bat mitzvah, especially in June, which is traditionally a busy month for schools. In the end, she says everyone was thrilled with how well it turned out.

"I really could not have done it without the whole Heschel community. The parents, teachers, administrators, they were so excited, so enthused. It made the whole thing like a dream come true," she says.

"I don't regret it for a second," she says. She even had the service videotaped for posterity.

Does Baker now have sympathy now for the 13-year-olds who are preparing for their own bar and bat mitzvahs?

"Totally. Total sympathy," she says.

Find Jewish events with a single click

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

There's a new way to keep your finger on the pulse of Toronto's Jewish community's events for young adults – just keep your finger on your computer mouse and go to www.Shmuot.com, which endeavours to be a one-stop-click for listings of upcoming Jewish and Israeli events.

The heart of Shmuot is the events calendar where events are posted and promoted. The site's photo galleries also enable event organizers to upload pictures from an event, making them available for instant public viewing.

New website lists events for young adults

Shmuot was developed by Haniel Croitoru, 30, a product manager for a medical imaging company, and Ziv Kenet, 29, a self-employed software development consultant. They also work with volunteers who write about events and take photos for the site.

Shmuot in Hebrew means "hearsay" or "rumours."

"Previously, we and our friends only knew about events by word of mouth, often after the event had already happened, so we thought that name was appropriate for the site," Croitoru says.

Before Shmuot, he says, there was no single Internet or media source in Toronto that listed Jewish and Israeli events. With their background in creating websites, Croitoru and Kenet realized that they could create a new website to help fill this void.

"Our goal was, and still is, to have all the events for the young adult Jewish and Israeli communities of Toronto be listed on the site," he says.

They did it by having organizers add their own events online.

"We thought this would help keep the community informed about events which, in turn, would make the events more successful," Croitoru says. "Ultimately we feel this will strengthen the community."

The website, gearing up for its year anniversary this week, has set up new features to make searching for local Jewish events easier. Visitors can search for specific events according to category, for example, social or political. Users can customize their calendar preference and receive information only about the events they are interested in.

Among the new features is a Discussion Forum, where users can post and respond to questions on various topics ranging from restaurants to job searches. Also added are links to live Toronto radio stations and real-time news feeds from Toronto and Israeli sources.

Until now, Croitoru and Kenet have been developing Shmuot in their spare time, 10 to 30 hours a week, and have paid for all expenses.They hope to raise money to cover costs through advertising, but they intend to keep the services for readers and event organizers free.

Croitoru says the events posted on Shmuot.com aren't the only place people can mingle. "With the new features we're hoping that Shmuot will become an online hangout for the Toronto Jewish and Israeli communities."

Limmud is coming to Toronto

Where can people learn about Jewish text and Jewish cooking, Yiddish songs and feminist Israeli poetry, sexuality in biblical narrative, and Trudeau and Canadian Jews – all in one day? Where can they mingle with some of Canada's top Jewish educators, community organizers, writers, and rabbis?

At the Limmud Festival of Jewish Learning about to be launched in Toronto by Limmud chair Peter Sevitt and a committee of volunteers.

The Hebrew word for learning is limmud and this word is the inspiration for the gathering. Limmud originated in the United Kingdom almost 25 years ago and is Europe's largest and most influential Jewish educational event, attracting over 2,300 participants and 370 presenters from across the globe.

Limmud offers a unique blend of formal and informal education, drawing on resources from all sectors of the Jewish community – from the Orthodox to the unaffiliated.

The first conference to use Limmud UK's principles and format in Canada will be held on November 21at York University's Founders College.

Sevitt, a Toronto accountant, attended Limmud for several years in England and was so impressed that he decided to bring the experience to Canada.

"It's incredible to see people of all ages and backgrounds come together to learn and discuss topics that are meaningful to them. The spirit and energy [at Limmud UK] are unforgettable, and I want to re-create that in Toronto.

"By offering Limmud to Canadians, we are creating opportunities for participants to widen their Jewish horizons while having fun and meeting new people," he said.

Jewish veterans remember their fallen comrades

MEMORIAL SERVICE: Members of General Wingate Branch 256 Royal Canadian Legion and Jewish War Veterans Post of Canada recently assembled for their remembrance parade and service, held each year before the High Holy Days at the Canadian Veterans' War Memorial at Mount Sinai Cemetery. The service, held indoors due to rain, was in honour of all Canadian Jewish soldiers who died during active duty. The service included a keynote address by MPP Monte Kwinter; reveille and the last post; reading of names; the sounding of the shofar by RCAF veteran Roy Waisberg; and a recitation of K'El Maleh Rachamim by Cantor David Young. Branch president is Sam Romberg, parade chair is Murray Jacobs and sergeant at arms is Jerry Rosenberg. [Carolyn Blackman photos.]

THE NEW HOLOCAUST HISTORY MUSEUM ... A VIEW TO MEMORY

"I face this task with humility," were the opening words of world-renowned architect, Moshe Safdie, at the groundbreaking ceremony for the new Holocaust History Museum in May, 2000.

Safdie developed a prism-like structure 175 metres long, mostly underground, cutting into the Mount of Remembrance. The Museum entry cantilevers over the mountain, across the valley to the south, as its triangular shape disappears into the slopes with only its uppermost edge, a skylight, protruding through the mountain ridge — a luminous marker in the landscape.

The end of the Museum bursts forth from the mountain's slope; emerging from the story of destruction of the past to the breathtaking view of modern-day Jerusalem. This "World Rebuilt" balcony was generously endowed by Dr. Max and Gianna Glassman of Toronto.

The official opening of the New Museum will be held on March 15, 2005.

Proceeds from this campaign will purchase shuttle buses to provide comfortable touring of the 45-acre Yad Vashem campus.

Yearnings of the Jewish soul

By RABBI SAMMY JACKMAN

Guest Voice

I sat across the table from a Jewish-looking gentleman. He was casually eating some pork. I had seen him last at the first Hillel Friday night of the year.

I asked him if I could interest him in any Jewish activities. He was not interested. I asked what had brought him to the Friday-night dinner. He said that his parents had insisted that he go, then a Catholic girl started to tease him for eating pork and I left.

Another evening, I sat across a different table, from a young Catholic. I asked him why he was considering converting to Judaism. He explained that he was ethnically Jewish and that after trying out all the spiritual alternatives he could find, he had decided that Judaism was the one for him.

I asked him what he meant by ethnically Jewish. He said that his maternal grandmother was Jewish and was thrilled that he had stopped eating pork. His Catholic father was teasing him about it. I gently broke the news to him that he did not need to convert, that he was a Jew.

I have for the last year been working as the rabbi of Hillel Montreal, a partnership between Hillel and Kollel Torah Mitzion. The Kollel and Hillel both understand the importance of having a modern Zionist Orthodox Rabbi on campus. Thanks to them, I am able to reach both local students and those from out of town. These stories represent the two extremes of the students I meet.

At one extreme, they run away from their parents' wishes. Here is a Jew who never did Judaism for internal reasons. External pressure was always the driving force. All I can do is foster a positive atmosphere, offer attractive events and hope for a change of heart.

At the other extreme, they run to Judaism against all odds, often against their parents' wishes. In them, you can see the pintele Yid, the Jewish soul that brings us back, that "genetic belief in God" that Karl Marx, the atheist himself, admitted having. All they need is careful guidance.

This is also the story of the Jewish people. Sometimes our connection to God is one of love, sometimes we rebel. The same nation that left Egypt like a loving, trusting bride (Jeremiah 2:2), that said na'aseh venishma (we will do it even before we understand it) at Mount Sinai, also rebelled 10 times in just more than a year (Numbers 14:22). The midrash paints the experience at Mount Sinai as both a joyous wedding and a terrifying trip, where our souls literally left our bodies and we needed to be brought back from the dead.

I've met many student couples for whom commitment is a terrifying leap of faith. Love and romance has to overcome a palpable fear of being tied down; only then can they take the plunge and get married. Mount Sinai involved much more commitment than any normal marriage and that can explain our rebellion in the wilderness. But is that why Jews are running away from Judaism today? Is it just a fear of commitment?

Sometimes it is. But the more you look around you, the more you see that for many, the flight from Judaism is a natural one born not of fear but of emptiness. For my pork-eating friend, sent away to a Christian boarding school for high school, his only connection to Judaism is a faint wish of his parents that he marry Jewish. For others, a religious education that never spoke to them – an education that was forced on them and that they never connected to – leaves only a feeling of emptiness.

These students also have a Jewish soul yearning for spirituality. But that soul, denied a meaningful Judaism, finds other outlets.

Some find other religions. Jews are overrepresented in many faiths and cults. Forty per cent of Buddhists in Britain were found to be Jewish. Other Jews found charities and do great works. An American Jewish charity is leading the way in Sudan, trying to save the victims of attempted genocide.

In voting patterns, Canadian and American Jews defy all logic. Whoever heard of wealthy people voting for higher taxes in large numbers? Perhaps this is how they satisfy the yearnings of their Jewish soul.

If only all that holiness, all that dedication could be focused inward on building our holy nation as a light to the nations, a light that we know will one day repair our world. Let us dream and build our Jewish communities to satisfy the yearnings of all of our Jewish souls. As Hillel the elder said, if not now, when?

Rabbi Sammy Jackman is affiliated with Hillel Montreal and the Kollel Torah Mitzion in Cote St. Luc. On shlichut from Israel, he is starting his second year with the Hillel students. He has a regular segment on www.hillel.ca.

Midrashic Moments

As we approach Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, we experience a build-up of intensity that raises the question of whether we should be engaged in spiritual assessment at all times and not merely at the High Holy Days. Are we supposed to spend the rest of the year going about our daily routines and sit back only on the High Holy Days to take a grand tally?

One might immediately respond by saying that we must constantly engage in intense spiritual assessments. Surely every day should be spent questioning our choices and our direction in life. However, truth be told, we are discouraged from enmeshing ourselves in this kind of self-assessment on a daily basis.

Judaism does not teach us to withdraw inwardly and spend our days in spiritual bliss while the world rages on around us.

If anything, we are commanded to actively participate in the world and aggressively apply ourselves to improving what we see around us. We don't have time to sit and contemplate our spiritual existence moment to moment. There is too much corruption around us, too much violence, too much suffering.

Of course, that does not mean that we merrily go about our business day to day and pay no mind to our spirituality. We must apply a critical eye to our choices and actions at every moment. This dilemma is the tension the rabbis speak of when they tell us to try to balance our intentions with our routines.

On the one hand, we are told to maintain spiritual and ritual routines so that these actions almost become second nature. On the other hand, we are told to maintain intention with our actions so they do not become so routine as to lose spiritual meaning.

In other words, the rabbis are speaking of spiritual training that will tell us how to respond to a given situation at the moment, almost automatically. And yet while our bodies our responding, our souls must question our intention within that response. This is the power of Jewish education and a Jewish upbringing. They create a routine of response. We immediately know what the "Jewish way" would be in resolving a dilemma. We are liberated within the moment so that our souls can ask us the harder question of intention.

Yet we cannot get so pulled into the moment that we are paralyzed and do not act. That is why the period leading up to Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur creates a window of intensity. Of course we need to be watching ourselves all year, but the truly complex soul-searching takes place at this time. Timing is everything.

When Abraham is on the mountain ready to sacrifice Isaac, some midrashim say that Abraham insists on having his say before God. Abraham tells God that although he knows he could argue convincingly over the request to sacrifice Isaac, and could win the argument, he is choosing to remain silent and respond with obedience.

Abraham states that this is a deliberate decision so that in the future, God will recognize that a winning argument has been left unstated – a trump card.

This card is to be played when the shofar is sounded on Rosh Hashanah. The argument to spare Isaac was not made and it becomes the eternal argument in asking God to spare all of Isaac's descendants.

When we teach ourselves to respond from within our Judaism, we create our routines. When we listen to our hearts as we are responding, we understand our intentions. When we recognize the intensity of this time and use it as we get closer to the High Holy Days, we walk in the footsteps of Abraham.

Shanah tovah and gmar tov to us all.

Torah from amid the terror

In 2001, Sept. 11 occurred less than one week before Rosh Hashanah (as it does this year.) Rabbis dispensed with their prepared Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur sermons and wrote new ones to help their congregations grapple with the horrors they had just witnessed. Theirs were words of grief, anger and consolation.

Thanks to two men, we can still learn from those words today. Rabbi Neil Gillman, a professor of Jewish philosophy at the Jewish Theological Seminary, and Jason Miller a JTS rabbinical student, have preserved over 100 sermons on the website, Torah from Terror: The Rabbinic Response to 9/11. [www.torahfromterror.com/]

Reading these sermons is a sobering experience. Three years ago, we vowed things would never be the same again. But for most people, life has returned to normal. Not so on this site, where you feel the raw emotions and hear the questions that had so few answers.

Some excerpts.

Rabbi David B. Cohen, Congregation Sinai, Milwaukee, Wis.: "When the children of Israel defeated the Canaanites, Deborah composed a song to bless God and the Jewish people. Near the song's end, Deborah spoke of the mother of Sisera, the murdered Canaanite general: 'The mother of Sisera looked at the window and moaned through the lattice. Why is his chariot so long in coming? Why are the hoofbeats of his steeds so tardy?' (Judges 5:28) The Midrash states that the mother of Sisera cried, screamed, and moaned 100 times while waiting for her son to come back from battle. According to the Bible, the Shofar is sounded only nine times on Rosh Hashanah. The rabbis of the Talmud expand the number to 30 times. Yet for 2,000 years, the tradition has been to sound the Shofar 100 times on Rosh Hashanah. Whence the number 100? Every Shofar blast, we are told, corresponds to one of the 100 anguished cries and moans of Sisera's mother. If the Bible bewails the death of one of Israel's enemies, how much more might we cry out for friends and neighbours we've lost this past week. How many agonies will our hearts have to bear?" [www.torahfromterror.com/sermons/DavidCohen.htm]

Rabbi Wayne Dosick, The Elijah Minyan, San Diego, Calif.: "My holy father used to tell the story of Yom Kippur, 1942, the first Yom Kippur after Pearl Harbor, the first Yom Kippur that America was at war in World War II. In the small Orthodox shul which he attended, the men sat downstairs and the women sat upstairs in the balcony. As the chazzan chanted the Kol Nidre prayer, when he came to the words, 'M'Yom Kippurim zeh ad Yom Kippurim habah, alenu l'tova…' 'From this Yom Kippur until next Yom Kippur, may it be for us for good…' a great cry arose from the balcony and washed across the whole shul. The wives and mothers had just sent their husbands and sons to war, and they greatly feared what would happen from one Yom Kippur until the next. Then and now, the days that unfold, one by one, from one Yom Kippur until the next, tell the tale of our lives. And the great question always looms, 'Who shall live, and who die? Who shall live out the measure of days, and who will be cut off mid-way?' The answers to those questions, we know, are in God's hands. Yet, this year, as we gather for our Yom Kippur worship and meditation, we are filled with wondering. For the Divine response that was given to us this year is bewildering, and overwhelming, and filled with pain. [www.torahfromterror.com/sermons/WayneDosick.htm]

Rabbi Ruth M. Gais, The New York Kollel at Hebrew Union College, New York City: "Thousands lived. Thousands died and are still buried in the pit of death. I have no answer why some lived and some died. I have no answer for why there is such hatred in the world. Ani Ma'aminah be'emunah shlemah. I do believe with perfect faith. I do believe with perfect faith that God is good. I do believe with perfect faith that God is the creator of good and evil. I do believe that God has granted us free will to choose one or the other. I do believe that God has not hidden His face from us. I do believe that God reveals that face through every act of love and mercy and pity that we do." [www.torahfromterror.com/sermons/RuthGais.htm]

The mitzvah of bikur cholim

Guest Voice

My mother had brain surgery last month. Her brain function is pretty well back to normal, but the experience got my brain going, too.

I was fortunate to be able to take some time off and moved in with her for a few days to help out. My stepdad was amazing, too.

But I knew I had to get back to my job and my own home, so my attention was drawn to the importance of family, friends and neighbours to someone who is sick.

The rabbis teach that someone who does the mitzvah of bikur cholim, visiting the sick, mystically takes away one-sixtieth of the illness. They equate this mitzvah with important ones such as honouring your parents and burying the dead, noting that doing these mitzvot earns a reward for the doer in this world and in the next. What is so important about visiting sick people, and what's the best way to do it?

My mother noticed right after the surgery that she didn't have the patience for movies or books, generally important sources of enjoyment for her. In this situation, visits and phone calls take on added importance.

You might think that your friend has his wife, children and/or caretaker, so he's OK and doesn't need a visit from you. But his wife is overtaxed and both she and his children have their lives and their jobs. A caretaker is not the same as a visit from friends or family members. For many people, having a paid stranger in the house all day, necessary though it may be, makes them feel even lonelier than being on their own.

When your friend or relative is sick, her life slows down. Suddenly she has time to see you. When only one of you has a busy schedule, it's a lot easier to get together.

Don't worry that you might be intruding or that you don't know this neighbour so well. It's a fine time to strike up a new friendship if you think the other party is interested.

However, be aware of visiting etiquette. Thirty to 45 minutes is usually long enough for a visit in the first few weeks of a serious illness.

It's nice if you can bring food, flowers or a magazine, but not essential. But never let the fact that you're empty-handed hold you back from visiting. You may find when get there that you can help out in other ways, so observe carefully.

If you're visiting a patient in hospital, you could clear away the dinner dishes that the nurse hasn't had time to get to. At home, you could offer to bring her food or a drink from the kitchen. Wash all the dishes, including the ones you find in the sink.

A phone call is the next best thing to a visit. Although not generally considered part of bikur cholim, phone calls can help, too. If your friend/relative tells you he's got a neurologist appointment next week, call to find out what happened. Except for very early in the morning or late at night, phone anytime, even if you think it's not the best time of day.

If you're the patient, let your friends and family know that you're sick. That way they'll have a chance to visit when it's most appreciated. And when they come, try to show your appreciation. They will be a lot more likely to return if you thank them for coming than if you ask them where they've been all this time!

This year during the High Holidays, I'll be thinking about the many times I was "too busy" to remember a loved one who wasn't well.

If we pay attention to someone who is sick, both you and the other person will benefit.

Ruth Lockshin lives in Toronto.

The Wolfond Centre ready for its first full school year

By REBECCA GLUCK SOBERMAN
UJA Federation

The University of Toronto's Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, built specifically to accommodate the needs of 4,500 Jewish students on campus, has opened its doors for its first complete school year.

The $4.3 million centre, completed earlier this year, is an important component of UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign, an unprecedented $250 million initiative to build three world-class Jewish community campuses in the city. "

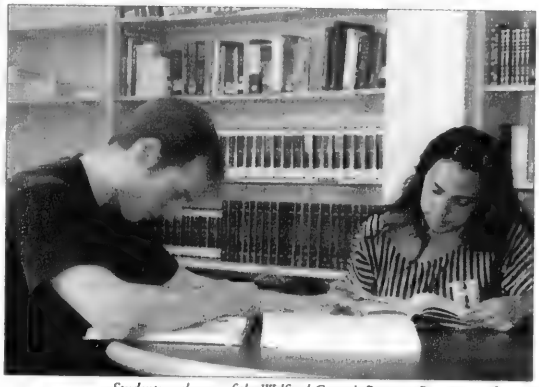
"We are so excited to finally have our very own physical space that is so noticeable and so well located, and to ensure students know we exist, we are offering a lot of splashy programs," says Lisa Isen Baumal, Director of the Wolfond Centre, a 10,000 square foot facility located at the corner of Harbord and Huron Streets in the heart of U of T's downtown campus.

Baumal lists a number of upcoming events, several of which are possible only because of the Wolfond Centre's presence. Among them is a 'Frosh Hashanah' party on September 23. Other programs, that will run weekly following the High Holidays, include Shabbat services and Friday night dinners, a first for Hillel at U of T, Wednesday dinners followed by a selected activity, and coffee nights. Meals will be prepared in the building's own kosher kitchen.

"We will offer a wonderful combination of programs like Hebrew yoga, kosher cooking classes, a monthly speakers series - programs that were normally hard to do because we lacked the physical space," added Baumal. "We are so pleased to offer a comfortable, new and spacious environment to lounge, to study, a place were people can truly feel at home, especially out-of-town students: We are a place for them to call home."

Already, a student from Texas and a student from Costa Rica have visited the centre to explore the facility and Baumal anticipates many more casual drop-ins due, in part, to the impressive appearance of the new structure that includes a common room, a spiritual centre, a fireplace lounge, and an outdoor patio.

The Wolfond Centre was built through the leading gifts of three brothers, Greg, Henry and Chad Wolfond, who named the centre in honour of their parents. In addition to its recreational uses, the center houses a fully staffed Israel Advocacy Department with the purpose of training and educating students in the art of defending Israel.



Students make use of the Wolfond Centre's Resource Room, one of many services available at the centre.

Historic Israeli organization names new executive director

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

At just 44 years of age, Australian-born Greg Masel is the new director-general, and the youngest ever, of Keren Hayesod – United Israel Appeal (KH), Israel's largest and most longstanding fundraising organization.

Greg Masel

As the fundraising arm of the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), UJA Federation's overseas partner, KH is responsible for raising US$120 million annually from 65 countries around the world.

In the year preceding his promotion, Masel was director of the KH English Speaking Countries Department, and from 1999 to 2003, he was executive director of the United Israel Appeal in New South Wales Australia, which includes Sydney. During his term, the New South Wales campaign almost doubled from $7.5 million to over $14 million.

As director general, Masel sees innovative methods of recruiting new donors as his most important priority.

"We need to identify and promote new campaign areas given the changing circumstances in many parts of the world. The former Soviet Union provides many good opportunities," he said in a recent telephone interview.

According to Masel, Keren Hayesod, under his direction, will be implementing a similar strategy to the one used so successfully in Australia.

"We want to do what we did in Sydney, which is to identify who and where our potential donors are and embark on a very sophisticated process to get to know them, but more importantly to get them to understand the importance of a stronger Israel," he said. "The new generation of donor is more sophisticated in its philanthropy, but not necessarily any less emotional than the previous generation."

And Masel will also be looking to Toronto for inspiration to fulfill his objectives.

"Toronto has proven itself year after year as not only being an extremely generous community, but one that appreciates a need for a strong link to Israel, and Toronto's allocations of funds reflects its understanding of that need. By any international benchmark, the Toronto UJA Federation campaign is first-rate."

So, just how does a man who grew up in Australia before making aliyah become the new director general of KH?

"Living half my life in Australia and half in Israel puts me in a unique position to understand the perspectives of both an Israeli in Israel and a Diaspora Jew overseas," he says. "But, most important is my absolute passion for the principles that KH stands for."

Hazon Yeshaya founder Abraham Israel knows all about hunger

By DVORA WILSHANSKY
UJA Federation

For Rabbi Abraham Israel, founder of Hazon Yeshaya Soup Kitchens, feeding the hungry in Israel is more than kindness; it is his way of repaying society. He can easily put himself into the shoes of the people he serves because he has been there himself.

In 1956, after the Suez War, the situation for Jews in his native Egypt worsened. Abraham's family fled, leaving everything behind. "We lived in poverty in Paris," says Abraham, "eating at soup kitchens for almost three years. I remember the pain and shame of hunger. This is why today I do everything in my power to help those suffering the same plight."

In 1960, Abraham's family fulfilled their dream and reached the 'land of opportunity' - the United States. There, Abraham earned a business degree from Baruch College and became a successful shoe importer.

After many years, he decided it was time to move on, and he brought his wife and seven children to Israel. One day, Abraham came across a destitute woman in Jerusalem, with empty shelves in her kitchen. "She had no idea where her next meal would come from," recalls Abraham. "I was astounded by her situation, but even more surprised to discover that there are hundreds of thousands just like her in Israel. I then vowed to help these needy people."

Abraham set up and funded a small kitchen to serve 17 starving Jerusalem residents. Today, Hazon Yeshaya provides more than 150,000 hot meals every month, in seven impoverished locations across Israel. The Toronto Jewish community has donated nearly US$100,000 to Hazon Yeshaya through UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

UJA Federation president Ted Sokolsky recently visited Hazon Yeshaya's Jerusalem branch.

"I was incredibly impressed with the warmth and understanding of the staff and volunteers of Hazon Yeshaya," says Sokolsky.

Gillian Shadlyn of Toronto volunteers at Hazon Yeshaya Soup Kitchens in Jerusalem.

"That warmth and understanding was certainly appreciated by the lines of citizens that extended around the block awaiting their one hearty meal of the day. Their faces will remain in my mind forever, especially those elderly olim (immigrants)."

Abraham's dream is to extend the chain into every city that needs a soup kitchen, ensuring that no one will be left hungry. "Poor people depend on us for their most basic need - food," he says. "We provide them with meals every single day of the year - even before and after Yom Kippur!"

Abraham's true wish is to close all the soup kitchens. "I pray that everyone will have enough food, and that our services will no longer be needed." Until then, Abraham continues to work tirelessly to raise money for Hazon Yeshaya's humanitarian services. "I have no choice," he says, "I have to feed the hungry people of Israel who depend upon Hazon Yeshaya."

Campaign 2005 quickly closing in on $20 million

Action plan for a safe Jewish future off to encouraging start

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

UJA Federation volunteers are crediting concerns about security for the impressive start of Campaign 2005, which is already approaching $20 million after its official launch, held just over a week ago.

"We have seen such an enormous response from people throughout Toronto who are so keen to volunteer to work on Campaign 2005 in order to do whatever is necessary to help secure the future of our community and that of Israel," says Dr. Jeffrey Lipsitz, chair, along with Michael Feldman, of UJA Federation's Professional Divisions Cabinet.

As chair of UJA Federation's Young Lawyers and Accountants Division along with Tracy Rotstein and Jeffrey Feldman, David Schlesinger is also buoyed by what he's seen so far from his volunteers.

"We're extremely excited about the incredible level of enthusiasm and commitment demonstrated so far by the members of our division," says Schlesinger. "These are busy people with commitments of their own, and yet, they give so much of themselves because they clearly recognize the importance of Campaign 2005."

The campaign, described by UJA Federation as an action plan for a safe Jewish future, will allocate new dollars raised to four critical areas:

- Community Security: UJA Federation has initiated a special community task force to review local security needs, especially at schools and community centres.
- A Strong Jewish Voice: UJA Federation is supporting the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) and other organizations, which stand up for Israel and speak out against antisemitism.
- Building a Stronger Israel: Campaign 2005 will invest in several important programs with an emphasis on young people, victims of terror, new immigrants and Israel's vulnerable.
- Empowering a New Jewish Generation: Campaign 2005 will invest in training programs for young adults to help them counter antisemitism, and initiatives such as birthright israel and March of the Living to build a stronger connection to Israel and Jewish life.

Ambassador Dan Gillerman, Israel's representative at the UN, was the keynote speaker at the launch of Campaign 2005.

Tzofei Tel-Aviv brought their enthusiasm and talent to the launch of Campaign 2005, singing and dancing their way into the hearts of over 1,200 in attendance.

"We live in a world marked by toppled tombstones at desecrated Jewish cemeteries, firebombed buildings, physical assaults on Jews in Europe and ugly swastikas here in our own city," says Chuck Winograd, who is chairing the campaign with Robert Harlang. "History has shown us that complacency is not the answer. The only solution is to respond strongly and forcefully as a unified Jewish community. Campaign 2005 is just that response – an action plan for a safe Jewish future."

"Despite daunting challenges facing the Jewish world, our community has always demonstrated both the will and the means to act – to counter the harmful forces facing us," says Harlang. "We can and we will make it happen. Through our community's passionate participation in this urgent campaign, we can take decisive steps to help change the world."

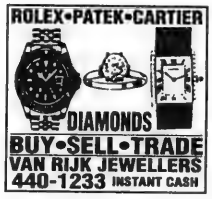
Differences profound but bridgeable for Bronfman fellows

Program brings together Jewish students from diverse backgrounds based on character, intellectual interests, talents and leadership qualities

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Now that David Zvi Epstein and Hillel Nadler are back from the five-week Bronfman Youth Fellowship program in Israel, the Yeshivat Or Chaim students are consolidating what they have learned on the annual pluralistic summer program for students entering Grade 12.



The program, launched 18 years ago, brings together Jewish students from diverse backgrounds based on character, intellectual interests, talents and leadership qualities.

Epstein, 17, says he now has "a better understanding" of where he stands as a Modern Orthodox Jew in relation to other denominations. He has become aware of "a greater qualitative difference" among the movements than he suspected, particularly in the "perception of how large a role Judaism is supposed to play in [one's] life."

Although he has relatives who are both more and less religious than he is, Epstein – who enjoys photography, playing guitar, reading and writing – said he realized when he returned home that this summer was the first time he had discussed Jewish issues in such depth with people from differing Jewish backgrounds. "Most of the program was talking."

In addition to dialogue among the two dozen North American participants on topics like talmudic thought and feminism in Judaism, students met with educators and political, intellectual and literary figures who discussed political, social and religious issues facing world Jewry.

Even when it came to political issues, "we all pretty much understood where everyone else was coming from," said Epstein.

In an Orthodox community, he said, it's possible to live an observant lifestyle without really putting any thought into it – something he's tried to avoid for the past few years. "I'd like to see more passion be put into Judaism."

He'd also like to see a distinction between "rigidity for the sake of preserving the halachic system" and rigidity for the sake of distinguishing Orthodoxy from other denominations.

Nadler – who has won two first-place awards in the Canadian National Bible Contest and placed among the top 10 finalists in the International Bible Contest in Israel last year – noted that a lot of the non-Orthodox participants came up with "novel insights" into Jewish texts they were seeing for the first time. The Orthodox students, who were more familiar with the texts, tended not to.

But even profound differences among the participants were "very bridgeable," said the 16-year-old. "It was a cohesive group. People taught each other a lot."

One week of the program was spent with a group of Israeli counterparts. For Nadler, it was particularly interesting to spend Shabbat at the home of an Israeli participant. "It was really interesting to be in a totally Israeli environment. It's like a whole different world… [although Orthodox] observance is pretty universal. The differences were superficial."

The program was "an amazing experience," said Nadler, who like Epstein, found his religious convictions reinforced. "It made me confront a lot of issues. You're dropped into this environment with these kids [from differing backgrounds]. You really have to figure out what you believe."

As follow-up to the program, participants must commit to at least 40 hours of community service. Although Nadler and Epstein have not decided what form that will take for them, Epstein is considering starting a discussion forum on contemporary halachic matters, while Nadler is leaning toward Israel advocacy.]

Teenager receives five Junior Achievement awards

By JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Intern

Despite the assumptions that some people may make about him, Brett Weil, the winner of five entrepreneurial Junior Achievement awards, insists he's a "down-to-earth, cool guy.

"I'm not wearing a suit to school and talking about the economic impact of oil on our economy," he said. "I like to hang out with my friends."

For the past two years, Weil, 18, has participated in the Company Program run by Junior Achievement, a non-profit organization that introduces business and economics to high school students.

Students in the program, for which they do not receive a school credit, meet once a week after school with a corporate sponsor and create their own company.

"I got hooked. It became more than just stacking my resumé," Weil said. "I met really cool people, I got to travel to Saskatoon, I met contacts in the industry, and it was a lot of fun, too."

Bryan Pardatscher, program manager of Central Ontario Junior Achievement, said that "students create a small company, make a name, open a bank account, decide on a product, create it, sell it, make a profit, prepare an annual report for shareholders and pay taxes. Everything you do for a small business."

In May, Weil received the achiever of the year award and his company, After Hours, got the Ralph Gerhardt Company of the Year Award.

"I'm not surprised that he got the achiever of the year award," said Weil's father, Ralph. "[The program] really got his enthusiasm fired up. He loved it. It's a huge pride to us."

Weil received an all-expenses-paid trip to attend the Canadian National Junior Achievement Conference in Saskatoon last month. At the conference, he was presented with the Seymour Schulich Award for Entrepreneurship, the most valuable achiever award and the Canadian Chamber of Commerce Company of the Year Award.

It was the first time three awards were presented to one recipient.

"I was really happy, obviously," Weil said. "It made me feel like all the work was worth it. It was really rewarding and it makes me want to give back."

His company was called After Hours, he said, "because [we] always meet after business hours."

After Hours created three different beautifully wrapped gift packages: a large coffee mug filled with hot chocolate, chocolate bars and candy; an alcoholic drink set with martini glasses, wine goblets, shot glasses, a decanter and a serving tray; and a picture frame with romantic sayings and a stuffed animal for Valentine's Day.

The company got a significant numbers of orders for the gifts, Weil's father said.

Weil and his 26-member company met one evening a week at the office of their corporate sponsor, Proctor & Gamble.

Weil's father said it didn't matter that Brett was tired, had a lot of homework or that there was rain, sleet, ice or snow. "Brett never missed a meeting on Monday night."

Weil, After Hours' vice-president of finance, said he wanted to "establish the financial function, so it was self-dependent and could run by itself."

That allowed him to be involved in other aspects of the company. "I gave input on all executive decisions, and I organized a lot of the purchases," he said.

Weil also worked in the production and process areas, making sure the company had enough products.

"It was a really cool experience," he said. "I really liked the opportunity to make the mistakes people don't get to make until it's too late. There's little risk."

Weil's father said even if a company ordered five or 10 mugs from After Hours, Brett "was still absolutely thrilled with it."

Weil applied for the achiever of the year award and the Seymour Schulich Award for Entrepreneurship by writing scholarship papers.

Pardatscher said Weil was among 10 candidates who were interviewed, chosen by advisors and then re-interviewed by the president of Junior Achievement.

"They look at [the participant's] role in the company, leadership, effectiveness as an entrepreneur and a leader, how well the company has done, the challenges the company had and how it overcame them."

Weil's father said Brett has always been interested in business."[During high school, Brett worked as] a referee at ice hockey and also had a little business on the side detailing cars, in order to supplement what he calls the 'very meagre allowance' I give him," he said, laughing.

Brett Weil, the winner of five entrepreneurial Junior Achievement awards, said "a lot of people at 18 are really interested in business but don't get an opportunity to play with it and make mistakes."

Weil said "a lot of people at 18 are really interested in business but don't get an opportunity to play with it and make mistakes.

"I'm indebted to Junior Achievement. I feel like a better person because of it. Now it's my turn to give back and become an advisor of the program."

He is part of the Junior Achievement student ambassadors team of 70 students and will be a student representative on the board of directors.

"I get to help older board members get a little more in touch with what students and participants want," he said.

Weil graduated recently from York Mills Collegiate Institute and will attend the University of Western Ontario this fall to study social sciences. He has received early acceptance into the Richard Ivey School of Business for an honours business administration program in his third and fourth year and plans to get involved with Junior Achievement's London branch.

Last year, he received a Junior Achievement extra mile award for a non-executive company member who went beyond his duties in the Company Program. "I helped everyone," he said. "I assumed that's the way it should work."

Weil's hobbies include golf, hockey and snowboarding and he is an avid car enthusiast.

He said his goals include travelling, trying new things and learning new languages, along with a business career.

"I want to pursue a career in banking and investments. I also want to start my own business at some point. I just have to figure out what."

Challah-making is spiritual experience

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

When Frady Schwartz gives a challah-making workshop, her recipes and technique are pretty much secondary to the spiritual aspect.

Schwartz, a native of London, Ont., who now lives in Brooklyn, says her approach to making challah – based in large part on a Hebrew book called Ohel Rachel by Rabbi Nachman Shlanger, and on workshops by Israeli educator Racheli Miller – was "heart-opening" in the context of an intellectually oriented society.

A lawyer by training, Schwartz is still known as Patty Leff to longtime friends from her days in Conservative Judaism's United Synagogue Youth group.

In the years since, she has embraced Orthodoxy, was widowed as a young mother of four, married a widower with six children of his own (her former surname was Uhr), moved to New York and had one more child.

When she talks about women who multi-task and are pulled in different directions, she does so with hard-won authority. But she also exudes a calm serenity that she links to every aspect of making challah – from the special apron she wears only for this task, to the personal prayers she says while kneading the dough.

Making challah is an example of finding purpose in a mundane activity, Schwartz said. "One way to do that is by doing one thing at a time, so you can think about what you're doing," she said.

Challah-making brings into the home five kinds of blessings, including protection and healing, Schwartz said.

Even the actual recipe ingredients are symbolic, Schwartz explained. "The salt is like rebuke," she said, measuring two heaping tablespoons, then shaking part of it off before putting it in the bowl. "We never [are supposed to] give as much criticism as we want to."

She also makes a point of sifting flour for the challah, "because of the metaphor" of keeping out the negative things and letting in positive things. "That's one of our big jobs – deciding what we want to let into our homes."

Schwartz prays for individual family members, focusing on aspects like their happiness, safety and sense of connection, as she adds the oil a bit at a time – a remembrance of its use in Temple days to anoint kings and priests. "You're recognizing the uniqueness and specialness of each person."

In New York, she noted, there is a hotline women can call when making challah, to find out names of childless couples to pray for.

The mitzvah of separating a small portion of the dough and burning it is a better-known aspect of challah-making that is both spiritual and halachic. It is a post-Temple expression of the mitzvah of giving bread to the priests as a gift, Schwartz said.

On a less esoteric level, she noted, "There's nothing like that smell of fresh bread."

Frady Schwartz

FRADY SCHWARTZ'S SWEET YOM TOV CHALLAH

Dough
2 heaping tbsp. salt
5-lb. bag of high-gluten flour (or all-purpose)
1½ cups sugar
3 tbsp. dry yeast
4 cups warm water
4 eggs
⅔ c. oil

Streusel Topping:
1 stick margarine
1½ c. flour
½ c. sugar

Mix challah ingredients by hand. Knead for 10 minutes. Let rise near heat, until it doubles, 45 minutes to 1 hour. Punch down and shape into loaves. Let rise 45 minutes. Mix streusel ingredients in processor for one minute. Sprinkle on top of challahs. (Leftover streusel can be frozen.) Bake at 350 for 30 to 40 minutes. Makes 8 small challahs or 5 medium.

Holiday foods around the world

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

It is traditional to serve a feast, a meal of greater abundance than is usually served, on Rosh Hashanah, the anniversary of the Creation. In the Book of Nehemiah (8:10), the people are told that after the Torah reading on Rosh Hashanah, they are to return to their homes and "eat the fat and drink the sweet."

There are many symbolic foods connected to Rosh Hashanah, and although it is almost universal to serve apple slices dipped in honey to begin the festive meal, every country, community and family has its own special holiday dishes. The table is set with the finest linen and dishes and laden with myriad delicacies representing the hope for a good and sweet year.

Living in Israel, the true melting pot of the Jews, I have had the pleasure of sharing Rosh Hashanah meals with Ashkenazim, Sephardim, South Africans, Australians, Canadians, Americans, Sabra Israelis and Belgians.

Customs vary, however. On the first night of Rosh Hashanah, after the challah and sweetened apple have been eaten, other symbolic foods that are mentioned in the Talmud or Shulchan Aruch are eaten, each with its special blessing.

Fenugreek or carrots are served (to increase our merits), leek or cabbage (that our enemies be devastated), pomegranate (that our merits increase as the many seeds of a pomegranate), the head of a sheep or fish (that we be as the head of the nations and not the tail), and so on. Each family has its own food customs, almost all are symbolic of fertility, abundance and prosperity.

The foods served are almost always colourful and sweet. No bitter foods are served, and most Ashkenazi Jews refrain from eating nuts because the kabbalistic number for nuts is equal to sin.

SMOKED SALMON NAPOLEON

With so many holiday meals to plan, almost everyone will make at least one of them a dairy meal. This recipe is not as complicated to make as it appears and takes the concept of cream cheese and lox to new heights.

Pastry:
1 package puff pastry, defrosted if frozen, but still very cold
1 egg lightly mixed with 1 tbsp. water

Filling:
about 2 tsp. Dijon mustard
8 oz. regular or low fat cream cheese, softened, or spiced soft cheese, such as Rondele or Boursin (at room temperature)
1 small cucumber, peeled and thinly sliced
2 tbsp. chopped fresh dill or 1 tbsp. dried dill
1/2 red onion, peeled and thinly sliced
8 to 10 oz. thinly sliced smoked salmon or lox

To bake pastry:
Preheat oven to 350. On a lightly floured board, roll one sheet (or half) of pastry into a rectangle approximately 15x12 in. Cut rectangle in half lengthwise, making two 15x6-in. pieces. Place on lightly greased baking sheet.

Roll and cut second sheet in same manner. Place one of the pastry rectangles on a second baking sheet. (Reserve fourth rectangle for another use.) Prick the three sheets with a fork at about 1in. intervals. Brush tops with the beaten egg, making sure it doesn't drip down the sides.

Bake for 20 minutes or until golden, rotating if necessary to ensure even browning. Remove to racks to cool.

(The pastry may be covered with foil and held at room temperature overnight, or frozen in an airtight container so it doesn't get crushed. Defrost at room temperature. Reheat at 400 for 5 to 10 minutes before assembling.)

To assemble:
Preferably up to 2 hours before serving, if necessary, trim pastry to even the edges. Place one sheet on a platter. Spread with a thin layer of mustard (it only goes on this layer) and 1/3 the cheese. (If the cheese is difficult to spread, warm slightly in the microwave.)

Top with half the cucumbers, overlapping them slightly, sprinkle with half the dill, half the onions and cover with half the salmon. Place second pastry on top and spread with 1/3 the cheese. Repeat layers with remaining cucumber, dill, onion and salmon. Spread underside of third pastry layer with remaining cheese (this will help it adhere) and place on top of the loaf, cheese side down.

Cover with plastic wrap and place in a cool place at room temperature until ready to serve, but no longer than 2 hours. With a serrated knife, cut into thin slices or squares.

Note: The pastry may be baked a day ahead or frozen. Napoleon may be assembled up to 2 hours before serving.

HONEY AND ALMOND CAKE

This honey cake made with a boxed cake mix and canned pie filling will delight your family and guests, and no one will ever know how easy it was – unless you tell them.

Decorate your holiday table traditionally.

Honey cake made easy

1 can apple pie filling (or other fruit pie filling)
1 small can crushed pineapple, undrained
½ tsp. almond or vanilla extract
¼ cup liquid honey
1 white or yellow prepackaged cake mix
⅓ cup margarine
½ cup water
maraschino or candied cherries for garnish

Mix pie filling, crushed pineapple, almond or vanilla extract and honey in a bowl and then spread evenly over the bottom of a 9x13 oblong cake pan. (A glass baking dish is best.)

Melt margarine over low heat. Add water. Stir. Add cake mix. Stir until well blended. Pour over fruit and honey mixture.

Garnish with cherries and bake in a 350 degree oven for about 45 minutes or until a toothpick inserted into the cake mixture comes out dry.

When you put it all together, Clover Leaf® means quality.

Together, these symbols stand as your guarantee of uncompromising quality. It's the standard you demand for your Kosher table, and the one that we demand of the Clover Leaf name.

Discover our Kosher salmon and tuna. It's a promise of excellence you can depend on all year long.

• TUNA BRUSCHETTA •

Preparation Time: 15 minutes or less • Cooking time: 2 minutes

1	can (170 g) Clover Leaf® Flaked White Tuna, drained	1/4 cup	zesty light Italian dressing, divided
1	medium tomato, diced	2 tbsp	chopped fresh parsley
1	clove garlic, minced	1 tbsp	chopped fresh basil
		16	mini pitas (6 oz / 170 g package)

• In a small bowl, combine tuna, tomato, garlic, 2 tbsp. Italian dressing, parsley and basic; cover and refrigerate 30 minutes.

• Meanwhile, lightly press any puffiness from pitas; place on baking sheet and lightly toast tops under broiler. Brush with remaining Italian dressing.

• Divide tuna mixture among pitas. Broil until heated through and edges of pitas are golden brown, about 2 minutes. Serve immediately.

Holiday Food Ideas

Sweeten your holiday with home-made desserts

By MARCY GOLDMAN
Special to The CJN

Holidays are often contradictory times and the Jewish New Year is no exception. When it comes to food for the High Holy Days, on the one hand (as Tevye, the waffling patriarch from Fiddler on the Roof, would say), you want the tried and true. Sameness has its own comfort quotient. These are hectic times and tradition, more than ever, is a welcome respite.

And yet, on the other hand, I am often asked, "Can't you make something new, something different for the holidays?" Well, it is the new millennium on that other calendar and that alone nudges me, as a creative baker, to create some new treats. The solution – a mix of both on my holiday table and yours. New satisfies our adventurous palates and the spirit of the New Year; traditional honours tradition and offers a warmth that makes the holidays special.

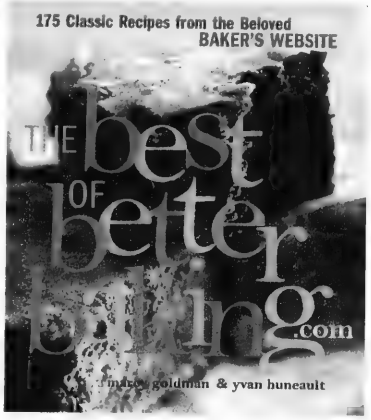
Rosh Hashanah is about a new start – a fresh year of living, hopefully tinged with honey. Desserts for the Jewish Near Year are usually sweetened with honey or resplendent with apples, both exemplifying a wish for sweetness in the New Year. We also offer something new for a new beginning, for example, an unusual fruit at the table, such as a pomegranate.

I have created a collection of lovely cakes and pastries simply based on the concept of honey. Unlike Passover, which is quite restrictive to bakers, even professional ones, Rosh Hashanah presents limitless possibilities. No matter what assortment you choose to indulge, the result is a sweet table that trumpets in the New Year on an exceptionally sweet note!

APPLE CINNAMON VANILLA CHALLAH

Honey-kissed round challah or egg bread is the usual suspect, but this essentially apple cinnamon bread that is neither bread nor Danish is a slice of heaven. Get this recipe its own website! What could make more sense or be more appealing – a rich challah laced with a touch of honey and studded with chunks of fresh autumn apples. A bread machine, set on Dough Cycle and bread machine yeast make this a snap. This works as a specialty challah or almost as an apple bubka or yeasted coffee cake.

Dough
1 cup warm water (110 degrees F)
1 tsp. sugar
5 tsp. dry yeast*
½ cup sugar
2 eggs, room temperature
1½ tsp. vanilla
2½ tsp. salt
½ cup oil (or melted, unsalted butter)



¼ tsp. cinnamon
5-5½ cups, approximately, bread or unbleached all-purpose flour
*I prefer Bread Machine yeast.

Apple filling mixture
3 cups coarsely chopped apples, peeled or not (½ in. dice)
½ cup white sugar
1 tsp. cinnamon

Egg wash and garnish
1 egg
1 yolk
sugar, preferably coarse, for sprinkling (about 2-3 tbsp.)
non-stick cooking spray

In a large mixing bowl, stir together water, yeast and tsp. of sugar. Let stand 2-3 minutes to dissolve yeast.

Briskly stir in ½ cup of sugar, eggs, vanilla, salt, cinnamon and oil (or melted butter).

Add in most of flour to form a stiff dough. Add in additional flour and knead 8-10 minutes to make a smooth dough. Place in a lightly greased bowl and insert into a large plastic bag, sealing lightly. Let rest until doubled, 45-60 minutes.

Meanwhile, prepare apples. Place in a medium sized bowl and toss with sugar and cinnamon.

Prepare egg wash by whisking together the whole egg and yolk.

Spray a 12x5-inch loaf pan generously with non-stick cooking spray. If you do not have such a large loaf pan, use two 9x5-inch loaf pans.

Turn dough out onto a lightly floured board. Roll or pat out into a large round (about 10 in. across). Press in half of apples. Fold in outer edges or corners of dough over apples (any way you can) and press to seal. Flatten dough slightly and press on remaining apples, folding dough over apples, pressing in any apples that may pop out (just put them back in and stick the dough on top later on). Don't worry if apples and sugar start oozing out – it works out in the end. Let dough rest 5 minutes on the work surface.

Using a sharp knife, cut into hodgepodge shaped chunks – about 16 pieces in all. Lay pieces of apple-filled dough in prepared pan, lining bottom first, then gently laying remaining pieces on top, juxapositioning the angles of the cut chunks. Top with any escaped apple pieces.

Spray dough with a light coating of non-stick cooking spray. Place entire pan(s) in a large plastic bag and seal loosely. Let rise till puffy and almost flush with the top of the pan, anywhere from 45-90 minutes. Remove from bag and dab on egg wash as thoroughly and generously as possible (since dough is not a smooth surface, you have drizzle and dab on the glaze, rather than paint it on). Sprinkle with coarse sugar, if available, regular sugar if not.

Preheat oven to 350. Bake about 45-55 minutes until well browned. If bread browns too fast, cover lightly with foil to protect top surface.

Cool in pan 10 minutes before removing and cooling on a rack. Makes one large or two smaller loaves.

FRUIT-OF-THE-VINE MANDELBROT

This Italian-inspired method of dipping baked slices of biscotti in sweet red wine, then sugar and re-baking makes divine and unique looking biscotti. Frozen cranberries work best – do not defrost for use in baking.

½ cup vegetable oil
1 cup sugar
3 eggs
1 tsp. vanilla
½ cup sweet red wine
⅛ tsp. salt
2¼ tsp. baking powder
½ tsp. baking soda
3 cups all purpose flour
1 cup walnuts, coarsely chopped
1 cup cranberries, coarsely chopped
½ cup cranberries, whole

Dipping Mixture
½ cup sweet red wine such as kosher grape or blackberry
1 cup sugar

Preheat oven to 350. Line two medium doubled-up baking sheets or one large one, also doubled up, with parchment paper.

In a medium-sized bowl, whisk together oil and sugar. Blend in eggs, vanilla, and wine.

Fold in flour, baking powder, baking soda and salt. Using a large spatula, gently fold in, by hand, walnuts and cranberries and blend well.

Spread or spoon batter onto preparing baking sheet(s), making a log about 9 in. long by 4-5 in. wide. Alternatively, you can make two smaller logs of 6x3 in.

Bake until set and golden, about 35-45 minutes (larger log will take longer). Cool 20 minutes before slicing. Slice in long slices, about ½ in. wide.

For dipping mixture, pour wine into a measuring cup or small bowl. Set out a shallow bowl or a piece of wax paper and put the one-cup sugar in or on it.

Brush one side of each biscotti generously with wine. Then dip into the sugar. (You can also dip cookies in wine, but this makes them quite moist and baking will take longer).

Lay the biscotti, sugar side down on the parchment-lined, doubled-up baking sheet(s).

Reduce oven temperature to 325. For the second bake, bake until biscotti appear crisp and dry (30-35 minutes), turning them once after 20-30 minutes. Depending on how wet the berries are, the second (crisping) baking can take less or longer time. The biscotti, when done, should appear browned and dry. Makes 24-35 cookies, depending on size.

BUBBIE STYLE MARBLE CAKE

What could be more welcome at any holiday than this lovely vanilla and chocolate rippled cake? It pleases everyone. Oil-based, it still tastes rich and buttery and is absolutely huge and dramatic. Boyajian orange oil, available from www.goldaskitchen.com, is a wonderful flavour extract that heightens the taste of this lovely cake.

1½ cups vegetable oil
2½ cups sugar
6 eggs
2 tsp. pure vanilla
¼ tsp. almond extract
¼ tsp. orange extract, optional
2 tsp. orange zest, finely minced, optional
4 cups all purpose flour
½ tsp. salt
5 tsp. baking powder
½ cup warm milk or orange juice
4 tbsp. cocoa
½ cup semi-sweet chocolate, coarsely chopped
2 tbsp. coarse or granulated sugar
non-stick cooking spray

Holiday Food Ideas

Kosher ethnic food is the next trend

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Debbie Diament, a cooking teacher and recipe developer with an interest in ethnic food, can help put a new twist on holiday meals.

Diament became interested in ethnic cooking when she was growing up in Saskatoon, Sask.

"My father, Saul, was a rabbi who taught Jewish history at the University of Saskatchewan. His associates at the university were multicultural, and our family was often invited to their homes for meals," she says.

"I enjoyed these meals so much that I developed a huge interest in food. I began reading cookbooks like other people read novels.

"I can still taste everything I was served at those dinners. Ethnic cooking is trendy now, but back then it didn't get the respect it deserved."

She began cooking seriously as a teenager after working in a kibbutz kitchen. "I learned to cook for masses of people, and I became inspired to develop my skills," she says. "I got into Middle Eastern cooking when I was studying at Hebrew University."

Diamant, author of My Place for Dinner, and a member of the International Association of Culinary Professionals, Cuisine Canada and the Women's Culinary Network, now teaches hands-on cooking classes in people's homes.

"I believe people learn best by doing," she says. "You don't learn how to cook by watching someone else."

In a city as diverse as Toronto, she adds, there is a strong interest in ethnic cuisine, "and kosher ethnic cuisine is the next logical step.

"People want something a little different. We make a complete five-course meal, and I tell them where to find the kosher ingredients. You learn a lot about a culture through its food, and I want people to experience that in a fun, relaxed way," says Diament, who has catered a kosher Thai bridal shower.

"My joy is knowing that my students have gone home and reproduced what they made in my class. I don't want it to end there; I like to hear from them."

She eats simply in her own home, she says. "I like grilled chicken and vegetables. I don't support any diet; I eat balanced food in moderation.

"I love eating other people's cooking. I don't want people to feel intimidated cooking for me; I am open and unpretentious."

INDIAN MIXED VEGETABLE CURRY

This very delicately spiced vegetable dish makes a good accompaniment to a dairy meal. It also is an appetizing snack when served with plain yogurt.

4 cups mixed vegetables, e.g., green beans, peas, potatoes, cauliflower, carrots, potatoes, mushrooms
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 tsp. cumin seeds, freshly roasted
½ tsp. mustard seeds
1 tsp. turmeric
2 cloves garlic, crushed
6-8 curry leaves
1 dried red chili
salt, to taste
1 tsp. sugar
⅔ cup natural yogurt mixed with 1 tsp. cornstarch

Prepare all the vegetables that you have chosen: string the beans, thaw the peas, if frozen; cube the potatoes; cut the cauliflower into florets; dice the carrots; wash mushrooms and leave whole.

Preheat oven to 350. Generously spray a 9- or 10-inch angel food cake pan with cooking spray.

In a mixing bowl, blend the oil, sugar and eggs. Stir in vanilla, almond and orange extracts and zest (if using) then fold in flour, salt, baking powder and milk or orange juice.

Remove one third of batter and whisk in cocoa to darken batter.

Spoon half of plain batter, then chocolate batter and remaining plain batter into pan. Top with chocolate and coarse sugar.

Place on a baking sheet and bake until cake tests done, about 55-65 minutes. Makes 14-16 servings. Can dust with confectioner's sugar.

HONEY ALMOND NEW YEAR'S BISCOTTI

Mandelbrot? Biscotti? No matter what the appellation, they would taste as sweet.

½ cup oil
1¼ cups sugar
⅓ cup honey
3 eggs
3 egg yolks
2 tsp. pure vanilla
1 tsp. pure almond extract
scrapings of one vanilla bean
3¾ cups all purpose flour
½ tsp. salt
1 tbsp. baking powder
¾ cup whole, blanched almonds, lightly toasted
½ cup ground almonds

Garnish
1 egg white, whisked
½ cup, approximately, flaked almonds

Preheat oven to 350. Double up two baking sheets and line top one with parchment paper.

In a mixer, blend the oil, sugar, honey, eggs, egg yolks, vanilla, almond extract and vanilla scrapings.

Add flour, baking powder, salt, and whole and ground almonds. Blend well to make a firm batter.

Form into 2 logs, about 10 inches by 3-4 in. wide. Brush top of logs with egg white, then sprinkle on flaked almonds. Bake 40-45 minutes until lightly golden and firm. Cool well, reduce heat to 325.

Cut into diagonal slices, about one inch thick. Rebake, turning once, about 12-16 minutes.

Thai one on this holiday season

Heat a large pan with enough water to cook all the vegetables and bring to boil. First add the potatoes and carrots and cook until nearly tender. Then add all the other vegetables and cook until still firm. All the vegetables should be crunchy except the potatoes. Drain well.

Heat oil in a skillet and fry the cumin and mustard seeds, the turmeric, garlic, curry leaves and dried chili gently until the garlic is golden brown and the chili nearly burnt. Reduce the heat. Fold in the drained vegetables, add the sugar and salt and gradually add the yogurt mixed with the cornstarch. Heat to serving temperature and serve immediately. Serves 4-6.

THAI MANGO SALAD

This tasty and refreshing salad is great as part of a Thai meal or serve as a side dish with grilled chicken.

4 mangoes, peeled and thinly sliced
1 red onion, thinly sliced
2 cloves garlic, minced
½ tsp. chili flakes
2 tbsp. rice wine vinegar juice of 1 lime
½ tsp. soy sauce
6 tbsp. chopped fresh mint
2 tbsp. chopped fresh coriander
½ cup chopped unsalted roasted peanuts or cashews

Peel mangoes. Slice into thin strips, working evenly around all sides of mango. Combine mango and remaining ingredients in a medium bowl and toss until well blended. If you want to make this salad in advance, leave the peanuts out and sprinkle them on just before serving. The salad will keep for a couple of hours, but not much longer. Serves 4-6.

THAI RED CURRY OF CHICKEN

Serve rice and a cooked green vegetable on the side for a fabulous dinner.

1 tbsp. canola oil
4 tsp. red curry paste
1 lb. boneless chicken, cut in thin strips
1 onion, coarsely chopped
1 red pepper, cut in thin strips green beans, about a cup, trimmed and sliced in half grated rind of 1 medium lemon
1 cup light coconut milk
1 tbsp. fish sauce or 1 tbsp. soy sauce
1 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
½ cup chopped fresh coriander, for garnish

In a large, non-stick skillet, heat oil over high heat. Stir-fry curry paste for 30 seconds. Add chicken, stir-fry until cooked. Stir in onion and fry for 1 minute. Add red pepper, green beans, lemon juice and rind and stir-fry for a few minutes. Stir in coconut milk, fish or soy sauce, and bring to a boil. Cook for 2 minutes or until liquid is reduced slightly. Garnish with fresh coriander and serve immediately. Serves 4-6.

Serve apples and honey for a sweet new year.

Scholarship winner wrestles with Mideast linguistic divide

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — David Mendelsohn is convinced that the protracted conflict between Palestinians and Israelis is due to each not really understanding what the other is saying, no matter whether they share a common language or use an interpreter.

Over the next three years, Mendelsohn will try to prove his thesis, shuttling between Israel and the Palestinian territories, and back to his home in Montreal, with the support of a Pierre Elliott Trudeau Foundation Doctoral Scholarship. It will pay him a stipend of $35,000 a year, plus another $15,000 annually to cover research-related travel.

One of 14 Trudeau Scholars for 2004

"We know how difficult it can be for all of us to communicate with one another in an everyday situation, even between married people or children and parents. Well, that is magnified many times over between people from different cultures," he said in a telephone interview from Netanya, Israel, where he is spending the summer.

"I intend to use my training in linguistics and my close familiarity with both cultures as a means of contributing to the peace effort."

He says little attention has been paid to how the differing ways that Palestinians and Israelis express themselves have scuttled peace negotiations.

Mendelsohn is just completing a PhD in classics and linguistics at Concordia University (he is the only student in that program) and will begin his second doctorate in Islamic studies at McGill University this fall.

Mendelsohn is one of 14 2004 Trudeau Scholars, all doctoral candidates, announced at the end of June by the foundation, which was established two years ago in memory of the late prime minister. The first 12 scholars were named last year.

The foundation's goal is to encourage outstanding research in the social sciences and humanities that is relevant to present-day concerns, and to foster public debate on policy-making. It is the richest doctoral scholarship in Canada in its field, and applicants undergo a rigorous selection process. Up to a quarter of the scholarships may be awarded to foreign nationals studying in Canada.

Mendelsohn, 36, speaks both Hebrew and Arabic and lived in Israel from 1994 to 1998.

"During that time, I became close to a number of Palestinians, with whom I practised my Arabic while they improved their English. I became aware of two different cultures that both wanted peace but were incapable of finding the means to communicate that desire to each other in a respectful, believable manner.

"I have come to realize that there is important work to be done in the field of communication between the Palestinians and the Israelis."

The kind of understanding he had with the Palestinians came only after "heart-to-heart" dialogue, and that was possible only because they shared some things in common, such as education.

He emphasizes that the misunderstanding is on both sides. Palestinians and Israelis tend to put their own interpretation, often negative, on what the other is saying. It takes a great deal of skill to be able to "read beneath" the words and phraseology of the other side.

"When Israelis see the mother of a suicide bomber saying on television how proud she is of her son, they think how inhuman she must be. But she is just as heartbroken as any mother would be, but feels the least she can do is publicly support her son," he said.

Socio-linguists have found that no two speakers use exactly the same "code" to express their thoughts, Mendelsohn said. Needless to say, the situation becomes much more complicated when speakers come from disparate cultures that have been at war.

The goal of Mendelsohn's study is to identify the role played by socio-linguistic factors in discourse between Palestinians and Israelis. He believes this gap could be bridged by having mediators at negotiations who are familiar with both types of discourse.

These are not the same as interpreters. Verbatim translation, Mendelsohn believes, can often be detrimental to talks. "We've seen that over and over again."

Mendelsohn expects he will be one of the very few Jews in McGill's Islamic studies doctoral program. In his first year, he plans to become "absolutely fluent" in Palestinian Arabic, spoken and written.

The doctoral dissertation he is completing at Concordia traces the cultural ties between Mesopotamia and the ancient Greeks through the language of prayers, a study for which he learned to read a number of ancient Near Eastern languages, as well as Greek.

Mendelsohn, who has earned several smaller scholarships in the past, holds a master's degree in archeology and linguistics and an honours BA in classical studies from Concordia. He has been a research and teaching assistant at Concordia, and has tutored in Greek and hieroglyphics.

He also once worked as a hotel receptionist in Netanya, a job, he said, he particularly enjoyed because of the opportunity it gave him to interact with so many diverse people.

Married and the father of a two-year-old daughter, Mendelsohn has another side, quite apart from his academic pursuits: he was once one of Canada's best amateur wrestlers as a member of the national team.

He won gold medals at three Maccabiah Games in Israel and is a member of the YM-YWHA Hall of Fame. He is now head wrestling coach at McGill. And if that's not enough, he is also a pretty fair clarinet player.

The Trudeau Scholars will participate in the first Trudeau Public Policy Conference, to be held in Montreal in October on the theme "Ideas Move – Sharing Knowledge Across Cultural Boundaries and Security Barriers."

Mendelsohn said he hopes to work as a peace negotiator when his student days are over.

Montreal mourns Be'er Sheva bombings

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – When FEDERATION CJA last year paid for trauma room equipment and ambulances for Be'er Sheva's Soroka Hospital, everyone hoped they would never be used for a terrorist attack.

Unfortunately, said federation president Sylvain Abitbol, the equipment had to be used to treat the scores injured in the two suicide bombings last week.

"We don't know how many lives may have been saved because of that donation," he said at a commemoration held for the casualties of the attacks.

The tragic events in Be'er Sheva are particularly poignant for the Montreal Jewish community, which has been twinned with that Negev city and its surrounding area since the late 1980s under the Jewish Agency's Partnership 2000 program.

Federation executive vice-president Danyael Cantor, past president Marilyn Blumer and rabbis Chaim Steinmetz and Reuben Poupko flew to Be'er Sheva the night of the attacks to confer with municipal and Jewish Agency officials, visit the injured in hospital and make shivah calls.

In the last two years alone, the federation has allocated $4 million to projects there, mainly for health care, but also for counselling and support for victims of terrorism.

Last year, Soroka's executive director and emergency room chief visited Montreal hospitals with the support of Partnership 2000.

The program also fosters personal contacts between the Montreal Jewish community and Be'er Sheva residents. Jewish school classes have, for example, been twinned with their counterparts, keeping in contact through e-mail, phone and occasional exchanges.

Students played a prominent part in the commemoration held the day after the attacks before a standing-room only audience in the Gelber Conference Centre.

Sixteen students from Bialik High School, Hebrew Academy and École Maïmonide lowered Israeli flags symbolizing each of the victims, while United Talmud Torahs elementary school children spoke of their love of Israel in Hebrew.

Abitbol told the assembled, "We are at war, but cannot fight this war like the others."

He stressed the strong bond among all Jews, saying solidarity is the best way to "fight for the land that is ours."

Israeli Consul General Marc Attali regretted what he views as the international community's indifference to Israel's situation.

"How many more Israeli lives have to be lost before the world recognizes the simple fact of Israelis' right to live and Israeli children's right to enjoy life?" he asked.

The "relative calm" of the past few months was due to the efforts of the Israeli military and to the security fence, he said, not to Palestinian terrorist groups reducing their activity.

"Every day in Israel there are nearly 50 security alerts, and over 2,500 Palestinians terrorists were arrested, and nearly 100 were killed on their way to committing an attack in the past year."

Attali said the fence has saved lives. These attacks took place in an area where the fence was not completed, he said.

"We have been told the fence is illegal, that it violates human rights. I ask the hypocrites: was the Be'er Sheva massacre legal? What about our right to live?

"It is the responsibility of the state to first and foremost secure its citizens. There will be no compromises. The government and the Israel Defence Forces will take all necessary measures to guard citizens' safety and to pursue those behind the attacks."

> Attali stressed that Israelis need the support of Montreal Jews at this time. 'Being together is our strength'

Attali stressed that Israelis need the support of Montreal Jews at this time. "Being together is our strength," he said.

Rabbi Sidney Shoham blamed international silence going back to the 1969 hijacking by a Palestinian terrorist of a TWA flight, with Israelis aboard.

"No one said a word... prime minister Golda Meir predicted that this would become a world disease, and she was right."

Rabbi Shoham underlined the closeness of the relationship between the twinned cities. "Montreal and Be'er Sheva are twins. Their pain is our pain. Their anguish is our anguish."

Sixteen candles were lit, while Anat Uzzan, the shlichah of the Israel Aliyah Centre, read the names and ages of the victims. There were gasps when she noted that one 33-year-old woman was the mother of six and that a three-year-old boy was the only child of parents who had been able to conceive only after years of fertility treatments.

To make a donation to aid the Be'er Sheva terrorism victims, call the federation at 345-2600 or mail cheques to One Cummings Square, Montreal, Que., H3W 1M6.

Charbonneau's UNESCO posting questioned by Day

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Conservative foreign affairs critic Stockwell Day is questioning the appointment of Yvon Charbonneau to a United Nations agency because of the former Liberal MP's "controversial remarks" about Israel and the Jewish people in the past.

In August, Prime Minister Paul Martin named Charbonneau, a fiery Quebec labour leader in the 1970s and '80s who was fervently anti-Zionist, as Canada's ambassador and permanent delegate to the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), based in Paris.

Day said in a press release that appointing Charbonneau "without [his] explaining or refuting his previous positions sends a wrong message to the international community. Or perhaps this is, in fact, a revelation of the federal government's biased views on the Middle East."

Charbonneau, once denounced as "an enemy of the Jewish people" by then D'Arcy McGee Liberal MNA Herbert Marx, had been MP for the east-end Montreal riding of Anjou-Riviere-des-Prairies since 1997. He stepped down before the June election.

Day says Charbonneau has never renounced what he has said or his activities while head of the Centrale de l'Enseignement du Quebec, the province-wide teachers' union federation at the time.

Day recalls that in 1983 Charbonneau instructed union members to put up posters in all public schools denouncing the "genocidal war of the Israeli government" against the Palestinians in the wake of the Lebanon war.

Charbonneau was the leader of a massive demonstration against the visit to Montreal by Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon that year. The weeks leading up to that protest were filled with bitter rhetoric, which infuriated Jewish community leaders.

Charbonneau was an outspoken critic of Israel for many years before that, in a time when Israel was not so openly attacked, and had made a controversial visit to Libya. In 1976, Charbonneau spoke publicly of supermarket head Sam Steinberg and other Montreal Jewish leaders in what former prime minister Brian Mulroney has described as "a decidedly racist way."

Ottawa Jewish community bids farewell to Divons

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Members of the local Jewish community bid farewell to outgoing Israeli ambassador Haim Divon, his wife, Linda, and their daughter, Michelle, at a cocktail reception held at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre recently.

As guests mingled and took their turns shaking hands and thanking the Divons for their able representation in Canada, a video clip was played on a large-screen television in the background, showing Israeli athlete Gal Fridman receiving a gold medal at the Olympic Games in Athens.

"It was very moving with the background of the Israeli national anthem being sung in Athens in commemoration of the gold-medal victory, to hear another Israeli ambassador in a long list of ambassadors speak so strongly about the strength of Israel," said Stephen Victor, past president of the Ottawa Vaad Ha'Ir and former national chairman of the Canada-Israel Committee.

Arnie Vered, president of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa/Vaad Ha'Ir, echoed those sentiments. "It seems only fitting that today we celebrate with Israel their first gold medal in Olympic competition. Gal Fridman has made Israel proud with his efforts, just as the Divons have generated such tremendous local pride with their representation of Israel."

Vered thanked the Divons for their many contributions to the Ottawa community. "Haim and Linda Divon have been remarkable representatives of the State of Israel. They have brought Israel both closer to Canada and for our benefit, closer to the entire community of Ottawa," he said. "The Divons have shown to many, both Jewish and non-Jewish, the beautiful attributes of Israel both in culture and history, helping Ottawans experience the side of Israel that is unfortunately seldom portrayed by the media."

Divon expressed his appreciation for the warmth of the Ottawa community during his family's sojourn here. "It seems like yesterday that we were here in this hall, in our first encounter with this lovely, warm community," he said. During the past four years, "we wept together, we went through difficult days together, we rejoiced together and it was such a treat for Linda and me and the family to be here... it helped us in going through such difficult times."

During their time in Ottawa, the Divons were known for their participation in a wide variety of social and cultural activities in addition to their diplomatic role. They made many friends throughout the community.

"Ambassador Divon, his wife and daughter made a wonderful contribution to Canada-Israel relations and I certainly wish them well as they go on to new assignments," said former deputy prime minister Herb Gray, one of the well-wishers at the reception.

The community's farewell gift to the Divons, presented by Norman Barwin, president of the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation, was a soapstone carving of an inukshuk. Barwin said the Inuit word means "to find your way back. It points towards Canada and towards Ottawa, and we hope it will enable you to find your way back."

"Finally, I learned to skate on the canal," said Divon, "so we will be back for sure."

Rosh Hashanah and Continuity...

This time of year in the Jewish calendar is all about beginnings and recommitments. Thankfully, once again, we are given the opportunity to begin anew and to recommit to the people, the values and the way of life that are most precious to us. If staying connected to the Jewish community in Canada and abroad is part of that new beginning for you , there is no better vehicle for doing so than The Canadian Jewish News.

As a way of helping individuals launch their new beginnings, The CJN is introducing a special continuity subscription offer in time for Rosh Hashanah. We have decided to offer our readers a special, one-time opportunity to provide their children or their grandchildren with their own subscription to The CJN.

A gift subscription for your child or grandchild, who does not already subscribe to The CJN, will cost $19.95 (taxes included) for one full year to anywhere in Canada.

Over the past few years, The CJN has grown and evolved into an award-winning national community newspaper widely read both here in Canada and abroad. We are extremely proud of this publication.

Could there be a better gift at Rosh Hashanah for your child or grandchild than the opportunity to feel part of the Jewish community?

Sincerely,

Mordechai Ben-Dat

The editor.

For the sake of the children

The two youngsters, whose unaffected cordiality is flawlessly captured by the camera, are children of Israel.

The cloudless, deep blue sky behind them belies the storm of terror that has broken upon the land these past three years. Alas, there appears no imminent sign on the horizon that the storm will abate.

Israeli cabinet minister Natan Sharansky recently told a Toronto audience about a new, terror-induced phenomenon that has taken hold in Jerusalem.

Members of families leave notes of love whenever they leave the house. However mundane and routine the reason for the departure – a child going to school, a parent to work or a sibling merely going shopping – a note of love and of possible farewell is left behind, usually on the kitchen table, so that no words might be left unsaid in the cruel event that the child or the parent does not return home.

Editorial

Wherefore greet the coming year as we did last the one: with hope in our hearts and a prayer on our lips that this year will bring the people of Israel closer to peace.

Rosh Hashanah is the holiday of judgment. We are sustained by the traditional belief that one of the key underpinnings of our world is justice, even though it is not always apparent to our merely human sensibility and understanding.

But where is the justice, we cry out, when suicide bombers wantonly and deliberately slaughter children returning from an outing at the Kotel?

Where is the justice, we cry out, when the United Nations General Assembly protects the chief planner and practitioner of terrorism?

Where is the justice, we cry out, over and over again?

Canadian writes speeches for Israel's UN mission

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When Israel's ambassador to the United Nations, Dan Gillerman, gives a speech, the words bear the strong imprint of a Canadian writer with a black belt in Kung Fu.

Gregory Levey, 26, is the head speechwriter at Israel's permanent mission at the UN in New York City.

A graduate of Bialik Hebrew Day School and Forest Hill Collegiate Institute, he has been employed by the mission for about the past six months.

At first, Levey assisted in writing speeches and press releases. But for the past two months, he has been crafting speeches Gillerman and other diplomats deliver in the General Assembly, the Security Council or in one of the UN's various committees.

His work load depends on developments at the UN and in Israel.

"Some weeks there are no speeches, and I spend my time working on future speeches we anticipate," said Levey. "At other times, there can be three to five statements or speeches in a week."

On rarer occasions, he is swamped.

"There was a day recently when there were three major speeches presented by us within two days in different UN forums, all of which I had written or had a part in."

Typically, Levey seeks the advice of colleagues when he prepares a speech.

"I consult heavily with the person who will deliver the speech, but the Foreign Ministry in Jerusalem has a say. And the input of our delegation's legal adviser is also incredibly important," explained Levy, who is currently studying law at Fordham University.

Levy, who holds a BA degree from the University of Toronto (English language and literature) and an MA from New York University (humanities and social thought), is not an expert in Middle Eastern affairs.

But he has read a lot about the history and politics of the region, and he wrote his MA thesis on the three-way relationship between British novelist Salman Rushdie, the United States and Islamic radicalism.

And now, as he completes his law degree at night, he is tailoring much of his legal studies to the Middle East, taking such courses as law and terror, the law of war and Islamic law.

Levey, however, has no intention of practising law once he completes his degree next May.

"I find it too dry and lifeless. Still, my legal knowledge certainly comes into play very regularly at work. I must be one of the only law students around who has absolutely no use whatsoever for texts such as Corporate Law or Tax Law, but who makes somewhat frequent use of The Law of War and The Law of Nuclear Weapons.

Levey was hired by Arye Mekel, Israel's former deputy representative at the UN and now consul general in New York.

Levey a graduate of Bialik

"The job came about basically as a fluke," said Levey.

"I applied for an internship at the mission by e-mailing in an application. As it turned out, they were not even offering internships. Somehow, though, my application landed on the wrong person's desk at the right time. They knew they would soon need another speechwriter, and my writing background, combined with my legal training, seemed like a good fit."

Levey, who speaks conversational Hebrew and some Arabic, has family and friends in Israel, and visits the country fairly often.

He learned the basics of Hebrew at Bialik, but gradually forgot it. "I then proceeded to teach it to myself from books and tapes. I spent last summer in an ulpan in Israel, which brought my Hebrew to a functional level."

Born in South Africa in 1978, he immigrated to Toronto with his parents, Paul and Pearl, when he was five years old.

Levey's father works in the high-tech medical industry. His mother is a learning disability specialist at the University of Toronto.

His 23-year-old sister, Simone, just graduated from McGill University in Montreal, while his brother, Ryan, 17, is a student at Crestwood High School in Toronto.

For four summers, Levey worked at Camp Shalom in Gravenhurst, Ontario – first as a martial arts instructor and then as a drama coach.

An amateur boxer and a black belt in Kung Fu, he is proficient in Jeet Kune Do as well.

On the side, Levey, the winner of the 1999 Norma Epstein Award for Creative Writing at the University of Toronto, is a budding novelist.

"I am just about finished a novel set against the vibrant nightlife of Tel Aviv, for which I hope to find a publisher."

And Levey, whose short stories have appeared in the Morpo Review and other small literary magazines, is also a screenwriter and playwright.

His co-wrote The Unfortunate Truth About Life, a movie melding humour with pessimism. It appeared at several film festivals in North America.

In addition, he wrote and directed Elsewhere, a comic play about an insurance scam gone wrong, which was staged at the American Repertory Theatre through Harvard University four years ago.

Digression, his play about a plumber who is mistaken for a philosophy professor, was produced at the University of Western Ontario in 2002.

"The play's plot and my current situation sometimes seem quite similar," he said with a note of self-deprecation.

Levey, a bachelor, is not certain what the future holds.

"I am torn. It seems possible that I can become an Israeli citizen within a few years and continue on in this diplomacy track, hopefully being posted elsewhere in the world with the Foreign Ministry.

"At the same time, I would love to just write. My hope is that the two are not mutually exclusive."

Gillerman opens UJA campaign in Toronto

"Israel is vibrant and safe and refuses to lie back and die."

Bringing tidings of "good news," Gillerman claimed that the "civilized world" will not tolerate terrorism, which he described as a great evil.

Citing examples of progress, he said that Libya and Pakistan have stiffened their respective attitudes toward terrorism, while Syria is treading very carefully.

"I hope that the Arabs, and especially the Palestinians, will get that message."

In the next breath, Gillerman attacked Arafat, saying he has brought nothing but bloodshed, destruction and poverty to the Palestinians.

Gillerman said that the "harsh reality" of anti-Semitism has reached the streets of cities such as Toronto, Paris and Rome.

His comments were echoed by Joel Reitman, the launch co-chair of UJA's 2005 campaign, and by Chuck Winograd, the campaign co-chair.

"We cannot relax and must continue to be vigilant," said Reitman.

Jews must be vocal in their reaction to anti-Semitic acts and should not succumb to complacency, Winograd said.

In a rousing video, UJA listed several themes for the forthcoming campaign: enhancing security in the community, creating a safe Jewish future, reinforcing Jewish identity and empowering the new generation.

It was disclosed that campaign 2005 has already raised $17 million.

New book chronicles Canada's Jewish war dead

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

The fruit of Oscar Adler's herculean effort is fitting in its size and heft. It is also a historic first.

The Canadian Jewish War Memorial Book of Remembrance, printed privately in Toronto, ends nearly a decade of work and marks the first time an attempt has been made to compile in a single volume the names of every one of Canada's Jewish war dead and all Jews who served in the country's military campaigns.

The work has a presence all its own. Measuring an outsized 11 x 14 inches, running 600 pages and weighing in at 8½ pounds, the high-quality volume is printed on acid-free paper and is thickly bound. Clearly, it's meant to serve as a lasting memorial to the dead, but also to remind generations who have never known the horrors of war first-hand of the sacrifices made by those who did.

Using archives and a computer, it took Adler and a small group of volunteers seven years to locate, collate and list all the 18,000 names in the book.

Although a milestone, "it's imperfect and incomplete," says Adler, 79, who's listed in the volume himself as a World War II aircraftsman (second class) in the Royal Canadian Air Force. He estimates that as many as 4,000 names are not in the book.

Just 50 copies have been printed, and none are for sale.

"They're going to be distributed to Jewish communities across Canada," says Adler, who will mark his 80th birthday later this month. "I'm placing a copy in my own synagogue [Beth Torah in Toronto]. Other synagogues may get copies but they must be properly displayed."

Queen Elizabeth and Gov. Gen. Adrienne Clarkson will each receive a copy.

Over the years, the project raised $69,000, meaning each volume cost over $1,300 to produce.

All entries are indexed alphabetically by name, along with rank (upon entry), regimental number, place of birth and date of death (according to both the Christian and Jewish calendars).

The "Jewish Canadian Maccabees of the 20th century," as the preface notes, are listed by campaign: The Boer War (1899-1902); World War I (1914-1918); World War II (1939-1945) and the Korean conflict (1950-1953). Also listed are Canadian Jewish UN peacekeepers and the names of Jewish chaplains who served in both world wars.

Full colour photographs of various military insignia, as well as war memorials and cenotaphs across the country, are featured prominently.

The work is meant to remind Jews and gentiles alike that "Jewish Canadians served king and country," Adler says. Other experts have noted over the years that Jews in Canada served in armed conflicts well out of proportion to their numbers.

The book lists 200 Jewish servicemen who died in World War I, and 1,700 volunteers in that conflict. Listed from World War II are the names of 452 dead, missing and presumed dead; 208 wounded, 84 prisoners of war and 196 who were decorated. There's a separate entry for Jewish casualties, PoWs and those decorated in the disastrous Allied raid on Dieppe.

Most of the volume is taken up with the names of 16,000 Jews who volunteered for service in World War II.

There's one entry for the Korean conflict, a lieutenant in the Princess Patricia Canadian Light Infantry named J.Y Levison, killed in action at age 22.

Two Canadian peacekeepers are listed: Lt.-Col. Jeffrey Dorfman and Maj.-Gen. Ed Fitch, the highest ranking Jewish member of Canada's Armed Forces.

Also memorialized are the names of 388 Jewish Americans who fought for Canada. Of those, 24 were killed in World War II.

Adler, who has long served on the executive of the Royal Canadian Legion's General Wingate Branch 256, got the idea for the volume about 10 years ago when he realized there wasn't a single memorial book for Canada's Jewish soldiers, sailors and airmen who fought for Canada in the 20th century.

"It all started when I met a woman named Rose Fluxgold," recalls Adler. "She asked me, 'When I'm gone, who's going to remember my two brothers?'"

The brothers are listed under World War II dead: Sydney Brown and Zave Brown, both from North Bay, Ont.

The only comparable volume was a photocopied book of Jewish World War II fatalities published by Canadian Jewish Congress in 1948.

Adler formed the Canadian Jewish War Memorial Association and got a federal tax number so that he could issue receipts. He and a group of five other veterans then began the monumental task of combing through the archives of CJC, Jewish War Veterans of Canada, B'nai Brith lodges, Jewish branches of the Royal Canadian Legion and individual families.

"We had many duplicates. But we narrowed them down as best we could."

Money for the project was raised among veterans and their families, friends and corporations. Adler says he got the cold shoulder from established Jewish organizations when it came to funds.

Adler cradles his "baby" like a proud father. "It's not a library book," he says, "and it's not perfect. But it's done."

Most Canadian media handled rumour with restraint

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

On Aug. 27, CBS News reporter Leslie Stahl broke the story of an alleged spy scandal involving a U.S. Pentagon analyst and the Washington-based pro-Israel lobby group AIPAC (American Israel Public Affairs Committee). The rumour was that a mid-level Pentagon analyst may have passed on classified intelligence about Iran to AIPAC officials, who may have then passed it on to Israel. As of this writing, nothing has been confirmed and no charges have been laid.

While the U.S. media gave the story intense attention, the Canadian media – which usually follow U.S.-Israel stories quite closely – have, at least to date, given it little coverage. Our media generally handled this potentially "juicy" story with responsibility and considerable restraint.

The Globe and Mail and the National Post relegated the story to their respective Aug. 28 news digest columns. CBC television and radio both aired brief, 30-second reports (Aug. 27), mentioning the FBI's charge of a possible Israeli spy, and a strong denial as "completely false and outrageous," from the Israeli Embassy in Washington.

CTV was the only broadcaster to give the story sustained coverage. On Aug. 28, Sarah Galashan reported on the implications for U.S.-Israel relations. Included was an interview with Yuval Steinitz of Israel's foreign affairs and defence committee, who said: "I'm 100 per cent confident that there is no Israeli involvement in this case. Since the Pollard case 20 years ago, there was a clear and firm decision not to spy against the United States government."

On Aug. 29, CTV news anchor Lisa LaFlamme introduced a report by Janice Mackey Frayer: "A simmering spy scandal is putting serious strain on ties between Israel and the United States… Today, Israel once again denied allegations that Pentagon analysts funnelled highly classified material [on Iran] for the Jewish State."

Mackey Frayer, reporting from Jerusalem, reminded the audience that Iran is "a bitter enemy of Israel that refuses to recognize its right to exist." She interviewed U.S. military analyst Anthony Cordesman, who explained that Iran is acquiring nuclear weapons and long-range missiles that "can threaten Israel's very existence."

Many analysts have pointed out that information sharing between the United States and Israel about the growing Iranian nuclear threat is well-established through official channels, which makes the spying allegations highly suspect.

Yet, as Mackey Frayer said: "Even if the allegations are unfounded, the hint of scandal threatens to test U.S.-Israel relations… Government officials here flatly deny anyone is spying on U.S. soil. They say the investigation is nothing more than a conspiracy to sully [President George W.] Bush's reputation before the election and to cast suspicion on his administration's special relationship with Israel."

Samuel Segev, in his Aug. 31 Winnipeg Free Press column, "Mole allegations running out of steam," predicted the story would soon fade away: "The false and murky allegation about an 'Israeli mole' inside the Pentagon is running out of steam. Contrary to earlier reports, no arrests are expected."

Segev, who has excellent contacts in Washington from his days as the bureau chief for the Israeli daily Ma'ariv, thinks the case may reflect nothing more than infighting between U.S. agencies. Wrote Segev: "Many observers… conclude that the leak was part of the ongoing feud between the CIA and the Pentagon. The leak may have been a kind of vengeance of the former CIA chief, George Tenet, who was forced to resign after he was made the scapegoat for the CIA's failures in Iraq."

Segev wrote that "the story was so murky that it lacked plausibility." (This point was also made by the editor of the Canadian Jewish News in his Sept. 2 column, "Suspicious spy allegations.")

Segev concluded that "many in Washington now believe that the leak will backfire and the accusation about AIPAC and an Israeli mole will quickly fade away." We may soon find out if he is correct.

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

UNESCO posting questioned

After leaving the union leadership, Charbonneau said little more about the Middle East. Nevertheless, Canadian Jewish Congress termed his nomination as a candidate of the Quebec Liberal party in 1994 as "troubling."

Day also notes that last January at a public meeting in Montreal's federal Mercier riding, Charbonneau "took a one-sided position in exclaiming to 500 people that the Canadian government should be engaged in a more active fashion on the issue of Palestinian restoration."

Day is probably referring to remarks made by Charbonneau at his renomination meeting in February where he said, "On the Middle East question, I hope that Canada contributes in a more active fashion to the restoration of the rights of the Palestinian people, without which no hope of a lasting peace can be envisaged." He also pledged to continue to strengthen the ties between Canada and Arab countries. (Charbonneau stepped aside before the election to make way for Pablo Rodriguez.)

The remarks were brought to light by Berl Wajsman, president of the Institute for Public Affairs of Montreal. Wajsman called them inappropriate and unacceptable, especially considering that Charbonneau was, at the time, parliamentary secretary to Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness Minister Anne McLellan, who is also deputy prime minister. The institute was also critical of that appointment.

Federal Court to hear govt. appeal of refugee status for convicted rabbi

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Federal Court of Canada has granted leave to the federal government to appeal the granting of refugee status to a chassidic rabbi, a convicted felon in the United States, who claims he will be in danger if he returns to Israel.

In December, the Ministry of Citizenship and Immigration filed for a judicial review of the case of Erez Shlomo Elbarnes, 41, who lives in Ste. Agathe, Que. In its request, the ministry asked that the decision made by Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) arbitrator Gilles Ethier be quashed and that a new hearing be ordered before another commissioner of the IRB's refugee section.

Ethier ruled in favour of Elbarnes' refugee claim in October.

Andrew Baumberg, executive officer to the Federal Court's chief justice, told The CJN the appeal is to be heard Oct. 5, probably in Montreal.

Elbarnes, whose name has appeared publicly in the past as Helbrans, was convicted of kidnapping in 1994 by a Brooklyn, N.Y., court in a sensational case that was widely reported in the United States.

The bizarre story of how Elbarnes, who had a yeshiva in New York, held a boy for two years after the 13-year-old was brought to him by his mother for bar mitzvah instruction became the basis of a book, The Zaddik: The Battle for a Boy's Soul, by Elaine Grudin Denholtz that was published in 2001.

> Elbarnes, whose name has appeared publicly in the past as Helbrans, was convicted of kidnapping in 1994

Elbarnes served two years in prison before being paroled in 1996. In 2000, while appealing the kidnapping conviction, Elbarnes and his wife Malka, who had been convicted on lesser charges, were deported to Israel, where Elbarnes was born and lived before coming to the United States illegally in 1990.

Three years ago, Elbarnes settled in Ste. Agathe, a Laurentian town of about 10,000, on a temporary visa with about 30 families who consider him their spiritual leader and began building homes and a large synagogue.

Elbarnes founded a vehemently anti-Zionist sect called Hisachdus Hayereim, meaning, roughly, "Union of the God-Fearing." Last year, the Vaad Hoaskonim, the rabbinical council of Orthodox communities in Williamsburg, Boro Park, Monsey and Queens, N.Y., issued a ruling that Helbrans' group "constitutes a great threat, spiritual and physical, to the Torah observant community in general and to every individual in particular." It forbids the communities to associate with Elbarnes and urges his followers to leave him.

Elbarnes has been represented by prominent human rights lawyer Julius Grey.

The Machane Israel Development Fund Opens Canadian Division

Anti-semitism is on the rise. More Jewish communities, prouder Jewish identity, greater Jewish involvement are the best antidote to the intimidating threat of anti-Semitism.

Machane Israel, the social services arm of the worldwide Lubavitch movement since 1986, has been responsible for developing Jewish communities and Jewish institutions to enrich the Jewish life experience around the world, wherever there are Jews.

Last March, Rabbi Yehuda Krinsky, chairman of the MIDF, visited with Montreal's Jewish community. Rabbi Krinsky, who served as personal secretary to the late Lubavitcher Rebbe, explained that the MIDF chose to open a division in Canada to step up its activities and expand its outreach work.

"Lubavitch has always believed that cowering in the face of threats to the full and free expression of Jewish heritage is a mistake," said Rabbi Krinsky. Naming Rabbi Simcha Zirkind to head the Canadian division of the MIDF, Rabbi Krinsky welcomed the support of the Canada's broader Jewish community.

Under the Machane Israel Development Fund, Chabad-Lubavitch serves Jewish people worldwide with more than 2700 institutions in 65 countries. Arguably the most dynamic, innovative force in Jewish life and continuity today, with a human resources team of thousands of men and women singularly committed to Jewish life, Machane Israel spans every Jewish cause.

Montreal Latin American Jews want to keep culture

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Viviana Raichman ponders for only a moment before answering what she finds the hardest to get used to in her new country.

"The winter," said Raichman, who settled here two years ago from Buenos Aires. She immigrated as part of the wave of Jewish immigrants from Argentina coming here with the encouragment of both the Montreal Jewish community and the Quebec government.

Raichman, 32, who emigrated alone, also misses the way of life in Argentina, where she often went out and socialized. She misses the food and music, too.

A new organization, JALOM (the Jewish Association of Latin-Americans of Montreal) has been formed to give recent immigrants an opportunity to preserve something of their culture, for themselves and their children.

JALOM (also Hebrew for 'dream') holds its first major event, Ritmo Latino, Sept. 11, 9 p.m. in the YM-YWHA's Grover auditorium. The entire community is invited to the party, which will feature Latin American food, including the popular confection, alfajores.

"We want show to the Montreal Jewish community the culture of each of the countries represented in JALOM, and to show our appreciation for the welcome and help," Raichman said.

JALOM, which is under the auspices of the Communaute Sepharade Unifiee du Quebec, plans to organize regular cultural, social and recreational activities for the Latin American Jewish community.

Raichman, who is one of the seven people running the group, believes there are between 500-600 Latin American Jewish families in Montreal, the great majority from Argentina. Others come from Brazil, Venezuela, Chile, Uruguay and Mexico. Most are under age 45. The greatest number are, like her, Ashkenazi.

Despite the cold, Raichman has no regrets about emigrating to a country she had never even visited and where she knew no one. "I had wanted to leave since I was 18," she said. "I didn't like the way of thinking of the Argentinians, the corruption, the way they didn't want anyone to tell them anything." She did like the North American style of doing things, after having spent time in the United States learning English after high school.

She studied hotel management in Argentina and worked in a major international hotel chain until the severe economic crisis a few years ago. She lost her job and was out of work for six months and then found only a very low paying new one.

"I didn't want to live in a country where you lose everything every 10 or 12 years. Here it is much more stable," she said.

Both the Quebec government and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services were making a concerted affort to attract immigrants. She enrolled in a crash course in French and took the plunge. Her only connection to Montreal was knowing someone who worked here and having seen photos.

"It was a little scary, especially when you don't have money," she said. "The weather was the last thing I was thinking of."

She left behind her parents, who were born in Argentina, and a brother and sister, who she says have no intention of leaving.

As a child, Raichman attended Jewish school in the afternoon, and was involved in a synagogue youth group, but otherwise was not observant. Growing up during the time of the military junta, however, she did experience schoolyard anti-Semitism. "Even the teachers showed in some ways they did not really like the Jews," she said.

She is struck by how close-knit and traditional the Montreal Jewish community is. In Buenos Aires, Jews did not concentrate in the same neighbourhoods like here.

Getting re-established in Montreal was not easy. She applied to hotels here, even offering to start as a waitress, but could not find a job. Five months after arriving, she began working in FEDERATION CJA's food services department as a waitress and has since moved into an administrative position.

Most of the other Latin American Jews she knows are satisfied with their life here. "Some just came to see what it was like, and have returned," she added.

The toughest experience has been for professionals like doctors, lawyers and engineers whose qualifications are not recognized in Quebec, she said. Even those with more practical skills have found they must re-train. An audiologist friend of Raichman's is taking a two-year course in order to find employment.

Most of these immigrants had English as a second language, and have had to acquire French quickly and often incompletely to be eligible to emigrate.

She knows of two couples who have each had a child since emigrating here.

Charlotte Amiga-Benzwy, the sole non-Latin-American on JALOM's committee, said this is "a very warm and friendly people. They make me think of Israel where I came from."

Shul fundraiser features gospel singer

By CARA EDELL
CJN Intern

HAMILTON — A performance by Joshua Nelson, a black American Jewish gospel singer, will help restore five of Temple Anshe Sholom's seven torah scrolls.

Profits from the Oct. 25 Torah Renewal fundraising concert, which is sponsored by the UJA Federation of Hamilton, go toward the repair, maintenance and adornment of the synagogue's torahs that, due to age and regular wear and tear, have split seams and cracked or faded letters.

Nelson, who has been compared to the gospel singer Mahalia Jackson, has performed with Wynton Marsalis, Billy Preston, Aretha Franklin, Cab Calloway and Dizzy Gillespie. His audiences have included the prime minister of Israel, the prime minister of Sweden and former U.S. president Bill Clinton. Nelson was the subject of one of the Hamilton Jewish Film Festival's recently screened documentaries, Keep on Walking.

"I want to take this music all around the world to all types of audiences in its original form," Nelson said. "I want to let people hear it and realize that it is not just good to listen to – it is good for the soul."

Hebrew Soul is, appropriately, the name of one of Nelson's CDs and also the term he has used to describe his singing style.

Madeleine Levy, planning co-chair of the concert and co-chair of Temple Anshe Sholom's ritual committee, said she decided to bring Nelson to Hamilton after visiting the spiritual performer's website at www.joshuanelson.com. She thought Nelson, who is a Grammy award nominee, would make the event "exciting and inspiring."

Levy invited a black gospel choir from Stewart Memorial Church to perform at the concert after Rabbi Bernard Baskin, an honorary co-chair of the event, suggested that the choir might like to participate. Founded in 1835, the church is Hamilton's longest surviving predominantly black congregation.

Part of the concert proceeds will be used to initiate the Stewart Memorial Church Disability Access Fund, which has made its long-range goal the installation of an elevator for congregants who are elderly or physically challenged.

The day before the concert, on Oct. 24, a gospel singing workshop will be held at Centenary United Church. Sponsored by the Jewish community, the city-wide, multicultural, interfaith event will bring together singers and students to listen to and learn about gospel music.

Endorsements for the workshop have been received from Hamilton Mayor Di Ianni, Strengthening Hamilton's Community Initiative, Hamilton's Interfaith Group, Ontario Workers' Arts and Heritage Centre and Hamilton Police Services.

Just before the gala on Oct. 25, Jewish and black students will present their response to the event, whose theme is b'yachad, or "together," through a joint artistic display. Artifacts and storyboards on the history of the Jewish and black Hamilton communities will also be shown throughout the temple lobbies.

Levy said, "We live in a city that offers diversity within unity. This project demonstrates that Hamilton consists of vibrant and harmonious communities.

"As we come together in music, it is our hope to foster respect across all segments of Hamilton's diverse social, ethnic and religious fabric."

Will journalists' kidnapping make France more pro-Arab?

By PHILIP CARMEL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Analysis

Regardless of the fate of two French journalists held hostage in Iraq, appeals from throughout the Arab world for the men's release are likely to reinforce France's pro-Arab foreign policy, observers say.

The kidnappers who took freelance journalist Christian Chesnot and his colleague Georges Malbrunot, a special envoy in Iraq from the leading conservative daily Le Figaro, demanded that France revoke its ban on Muslim veils and other religious symbols in public schools, which was to take effect when schools opened this week.

The kidnappers, a group calling itself the Islamic Army in Iraq, described the French legislation as "unjust and an attack against Islam and personal liberty."

The group has claimed responsibility for kidnapping and killing other westerners in Iraq. While the ultimatum to France presented no specific threat to the lives of the journalists, it said the French government had 48 hours to respond to the statement. At the beginning of last week, the ultimatum was extended for an additional 24 hours.

French leaders made clear that they had no intention of altering the law, while utilizing France's strong contacts in the Arab world to try to free the hostages.

Within hours, radical Shiite and Sunni Muslim groups, ranging from the Cairo-based Muslim Brotherhood to the Lebanese Hezbollah, were lining up to demand the hostages' release. The surge of solidarity for France within the Arab world was unprecedented, particularly since no such support was evident when Egyptian and Lebanese hostages were kidnapped – and later murdered – in Iraq.

Principal among those calling for the hostages' release was Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, who made a personal appeal to the terrorists in an interview with the French public TV channel Antenne 2.

In the interview, Arafat noted that French President Jacques Chirac was "a good friend of the Palestinian people," and said the kidnapped journalists "were helping the Iraqi and the Palestinian cause."

Arafat later repeated the call on the international radio station RMC Proche Orient, an Arabic-language channel owned by France's international public broadcasting network, Radio France International.

Arafat regards France as a key ally, particularly after French Foreign Minister Michel Barnier recently visited him in Ramallah, despite pressure from Israel to avoid the Palestinian leader.

France also was a leading player in persuading European Union states to back a motion at the United Nations last month condemning Israel's West Bank security barrier.

Arafat was not alone among Palestinian groups calling for the release of the French hostages.

The Palestinian Islamic movement Hamas issued a declaration in which it said the release of the journalists would have "positive repercussions on the political positions of France at both popular and official levels towards Palestinian and Iraqi causes."

While the group reiterated its criticism of the ban on Muslim veils, it noted France's more favourable policy toward the Palestinians "compared with other European countries," as well as its opposition to "the totally partial American support of the Zionist entity."

Still more telling was a call from Hezbollah's television station, Al-Manar, which earlier this month slammed the French government for appealing to French courts to ban Al-Manar's satellite broadcasts because of their anti-Semitic content.

Such remarks appear to confirm the perennial claim by pro-Israel groups in France that French foreign policy is overwhelmingly hostile to Israel. According to Michel Gurfinkiel, editor-in-chief of Valeurs Actuelles, that policy is only likely to be reinforced, whatever the fate of the journalists.

"If they are released, it will only serve to vindicate the pro-Arab policy, and even if they are killed, it will still be clear that 90 percent of the Muslim world stood behind France," Gurfinkiel told JTA.

Michel Darmon, a retired French general who heads the pro-Israel lobby group France-Israel, agreed.

"The message is that Michel Barnier gets the total support of the Arab League for the hostages' release," Darmon said, referring to the foreign minister. "They all condemn it to show how moderate they are."

Both men said the principal damage to France would be internal. Gurfinkiel said he was disturbed by the position of local "Muslim militants acting as go-betweens mediating with the French government."

When news of the hostages broke, Interior Minister Dominique de Villepin called French Muslim leaders to the ministry to appeal for their release.

Messages of solidarity were read out from Dalil Boubakeur, the moderate leader of France's Muslim Council, but also from the more radical Union of French Islamic Organizations, the largest group on the council and a body with strong links to the international Muslim Brotherhood.

Darmon slammed de Villepin's move, telling JTA it was "undignified for France's secular republic to call in religious leaders."

While most Muslim leaders have criticized the law banning veils, even the more radical groups say they have advised young Muslim girls to obey the law when they return to school.

But their position still contrasts sharply with France's principal Jewish organizations, which largely have supported the law.

Jewish groups regard the law as a bulwark against rising Islamic fundamentalism, which they see as a principal force in anti-Semitic violence in France.

While the law also bans yarmulkes as well as large crosses in state schools, it is thought unlikely to affect Jewish students since those who might wear yarmulkes likely attend private Jewish schools.

Nevertheless, France's chief rabbi, Joseph Sitruk, recently said he was troubled by the yarmulke banning until he, too, was brought into line by support for the law from his employer, the Consistoire Central, France's principal Jewish religious organization.

Gaza violence and rockets

Two armed Palestinians were killed near the Karni Crossing in the Gaza Strip last Friday when an explosive device that one of them was apparently carrying blew up after Israel Defence Forces soldiers fired at the two men. Troops opened fire when they spotted the Palestinians approaching the fence in the area, near Nahal Oz. Also Friday, Palestinians fired three Qassam rockets at the Negev city of Sderot, and five people were treated for shock. One of the rockets landed near a school.

Fewer Jews in Jerusalem

The percentage of Jewish residents in Jerusalem is the lowest since the city's reunification in the 1967 Six Day War. At the end of 2003, 67 per cent of Jerusalem's 693,000 residents were Jewish, 33 per cent were Arab, according to the Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies' Statistical Yearbook of Jerusalem. The annual survey shows that since 1967, when 74 per cent of the city's population was Jewish, the city's Arab population has grown by 225 per cent, compared to 135 per cent growth among the Jewish population..

Sharon objects to fence route

Ariel Sharon's objections to defence officials' proposals for the southern route of the separation fence are causing delays in its construction, Ha'aretz reported. The region in question is the southern Hebron Hills, the area from which the suicide bombers crossed into Israel to attack Be'er Sheva last week. The original fence route left large swaths of land beyond the Green Line on the "Israeli" side of the fence, but after a June ruling by the High Court of Justice, a new line was planned leaving only three settlements, all adjacent to the Green Line, inside the fence's boundaries. Sharon wants to see more West Bank land included on the Israeli side of the fence and his proposals are to undergo a judicial review prior to government approval.

Jewish terrorist found guilty

An Israeli man was convicted of belonging to a Jewish terrorist organization believed to be behind vigilante killings of seven Palestinian civilians in the past four years. The conviction of Shahar Dvir-Zeliger, 29, of Adei Ad, was the first in two decades of a Jewish terror organization whose purpose is to attack innocent Palestinians.

Hunger strike ends

Thousands of Palestinian security prisoners in Israel ended their hunger strike. Some 3,000 inmates held at 10 jails resumed eating last week, ending a liquids-only fast declared on Aug. 14.

Israel's war on Hamas takes a turn, toward Syria

By BRADLEY BURSTON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

In a conflict of blood and irony, it may come as no surprise that Israel's success in curbing terror by killing or jailing the terrorists' warlords may now spell even more difficult challenges for the military.

With some top leaders of Hamas in their graves and others on the run, Israel has begun to look north for the men now issuing marching orders to the powerful Islamic militant group.

Israeli officials signaled this week that senior Hamas officials based in Damascus had issued the orders for twin suicide bombings that killed 16 Israelis and wounded nearly 100 in Be'er Sheva last week.

Israeli officials have said "solid evidence" to that effect has been sent to Washington. Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom left for the Netherlands on Thursday to press the point with his counterparts in the European Union, which is poised to sign economic agreements with Syria's Bashar Assad government in the near future.

The attack rocked Israel, not least because it broke a five-month lull in which Israel had foiled hundreds of planned attacks within the state.

In fact, the very success of the Israeli campaign to, in the Pentagon's phrase, decapitate militant organizations may take the next phases of the anti-terrorism campaign into uncharted – and even more dangerous – waters.

"The weakening of the terror organizations in the West Bank and Gaza Strip have created a leadership vacuum external bodies are trying to fill. The most obvious are Hezbollah in Lebanon and Hamas headquarters in Damascus, both of them egged on by Syria," says Ha'aretz military commentator Amos Harel.

Harel says intelligence sources told Chief of Staff Moshe Ya'alon this week that Hezbollah currently funds and directs fully 75 per cent of the planned terror attacks mounted from the West Bank.

In contrast, in Hebron, a traditional stronghold of Hamas and the launch point for the Be'er Sheva attacks, the fundamentalist organization is in direct contact with the Hamas command in Damascus.

"The assessment in the Central Command is that the struggle against terror has changed. There is no longer a direct confrontation between Israel and the Palestinians. Instead, directives come from Iran and Hezbollah with Syrian support," Harel wrote last week.

The Israeli assessments begged the question of whether military operations in Syria might be in the offing. Deputy Defence Minister Ze'ev Boim's answer was prompt. "The rule that 'anyone who deals in terror against Israel is a target' is a rule that must be stated and one that we must stand behind."

Last October, breaking a long precedent in response to a deadly bombing at a crowded seaside Haifa restaurant, Israeli warplanes bombed a suspected terrorist training base near Damascus. It was the first Israeli attack deep inside Syrian territory in more than two decades.

Boim maintained, however, that Israel would take care not to cause a "conflagration" if it were to attack again on Syrian soil.

"I believe it is possible to carry out these attacks by correct selection of targets, in the correct 'dosage,' setting out the red lines that must be set out, without thinking in terms of massive conflagration, which is certainly not in our interest," Boim said.

Asked to specify the evidence of a Syrian connection, Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom declined to respond directly, but said, in an apparent reference to the Damascus-based Hamas command: "Syria is involved in terror all the time. Syria is responsible for acts of terrorism and granting patronage for terror, and therefore we view it as responsible the moment that those organizations receive direct orders from their headquarters in Damascus.

"When Syria is responsible, it must of course understand that there are some quite clear results."

Israeli officials have singled out as the senior commander behind the bus bombings the Damascus-based Hamas deputy political bureau head, Moussa Abu Marzouk. Long on Israel's hit list, Abu Marzouk is also wanted in the United States.

U.S. authorities detained Abu Marzouk in 1995 on suspicion of having set up and used ostensible charities in the United States to mobilize financial and political support for Hamas. U.S. authorities deported him to Jordan in 1997. But he was indicted in absentia earlier this year, along with two suspected Hamas operatives still living in the United States, for allegedly recruiting and soliticiting funds for a terror organization.

Last year, the U.S. government designated Abu Marzouk as a "Special Designated Global Terrorist Entity," along with Hamas leaders Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, Abdel Aziz Rantisi and Khaled Mashal, freezing their assets and barring financial transactions with them.

The Israeli military assassinated Yassin in March, and Rantisi a short time later.

Mashal, whom Israeli sources have also linked to the bombings and other terror operations within Israel, remains, along with Abu Marzouk, near the top of Israel's list of most-wanted terror commanders. Mashal narrowly recovered from a sophisticated, ultimately disastrous Mossad assassination attempt in Amman in the 1990s.

Senior Hamas official Osama Hamdan on Thursday cautioned Israel that the militant Islamic organization "will not sit idly by" if Israeli forces attempt to assassinate its leaders abroad, Israel Radio reported.

Hamas has said in the past that it would view such an attack as a "green light" to attack Israeli targets overseas.

At least one Israeli figure believes the benefit of military action might outweigh the risk of conflagration, said MK Yuval Steinitz, chair of the key Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee:

"Sooner or later, Israel will have to set down a red line with respect to the reality in Lebanon. In the past, when the Syrian army tried to move into the south with tanks, artillery and infantry, we attacked and set a red line, such that the Syrian army would not move heavy arms and units south of the Beirut-Damascus line."

In recent years, however, the pro-Iranian Lebanese Hezbollah has been shifting into south Lebanon missiles and rockets capable of reaching Haifa Bay and the Israeli heartland, Steinitz added.

"Whether they sink a boat, [attack] a truck convoy or strike storehouses, the time has come for us – even at the price of the danger of conflagration – to set down a red line and declare: 'This is it. We will not allow heavy surface-to-surface missiles to be deployed in Lebanon and pose a significant strategic threat to northern Israel.'"

French Jews worried about crying wolf

By PHILIP CARMEL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — French Jewish leaders fear they may have cried wolf once too often after a Jew was arrested in connection with the well-publicized arson of a Jewish community centre in central Paris.

Police say a 52-year-old Jewish man arrested Monday morning in connection with the Aug. 22 torching of the Judaeo-Spanish social centre in the capital's 11th district is the principal suspect in the arson.

Police said the man, identified only as "Raphael B." and described as unstable, is a former caretaker at the institution who had received free meals in return for his volunteer activities.

It is believed that the centre wanted to part company with the man, provoking what police think was an act of vengeance.

Investigators found keys to the centre at the man's former rented apartment. This discovery tied in with earlier evidence, including the fact that the burned building's front door was damaged from the inside during the arson, rather than being forced from the exterior.

The arrest shocked community leaders who had successfully mobilized the French political establishment to condemn what appeared to be an anti-Semitic attack.

Moise Cohen, president of the Paris Consistoire – the country's principal Jewish religious group and the organization that owns the burned building – was sharply critical of community leaders he said had reacted "without taking the necessary precautions."

"From the beginning we thought this wasn't normal," Cohen told JTA.

"The building is in a very quiet neighborhood and there was no indication on the outside that it was a former synagogue. From the start of the investigation, the police thought it was someone connected to the institution."

Cohen was equally scathing about politicians "who fear they're going to be accused of not doing enough" to tackle anti-Semitism – though in part they have become zealous in their condemnations following stinging criticism that they weren't taking anti-Semitism seriously enough.

Political reaction following the incident was strong, particularly since swastikas and various anti-Semitic slogans were daubed around the gutted building.

President Jacques Chirac was among those quick to suspect anti-Semitic motives, while Prime Minister Jean-Pierre Raffarin rushed back to the capital from his hometown of Poitiers to visit the scene and reassure the Jewish community.

In the aftermath of the attack, Jewish leaders sought to link the incident to recent cases in which judges had been lenient with anti-Semitic offenders.

The Jewish community could have been excused had its cries of anti- Semitism been isolated to one attack that turned out to have different motives. But the recent arson is only the latest example of politicians and community leaders reacting to an event with horror, only to have to ask questions later.

In July, an incident in which a young Jewish woman claimed she and her baby were attacked on a suburban train drew fierce condemnations from politicians and religious leaders – until it was discovered that the woman had made up the story.

Similarly, the recent knifing of a yeshiva student in the Paris suburbs was apparently not motivated by anti-Semitism. And police are still investigating claims by a rabbi that he was stabbed outside his synagogue in January 2003, as reports allege that the rabbi may have stabbed himself.

Less in the media spotlight is the burning last November of an unoccupied annex of a Jewish school in the Parisian suburb of Gagny. It looks less and less likely that the incident was motivated by anti-Semitism.

The Gagny arson led the government to enact new measures to tackle rising anti-Semitism, with Raffarin heading-up a high-profile Cabinet committee on the issue.

Nevertheless, for Jewish organizations and for the government, these cases are merely isolated incidents in a tide of nearly 300 reported acts of anti-Semitism in France since the beginning of 2004.

Roger Benarroch, vice president of the CRIF, the umbrella organization of French Jewry, told JTA that last week's arson and the reaction to it should "not cause us to lose sight of the essential, that the climate of anti-Semitism makes these things credible."

But he admitted that such events "give our detractors, and the anti-Semites, an excuse to doubt us."

Similar comments came from France's Union of Jewish Students, a group in the vanguard of the fight against anti-Semitism.

However, certain groups were critical of what they regard as Israel's exploitation of the arson incident, which came just weeks after Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon called on French Jews to leave the country "immediately" because of rising anti-Semitism.

Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom flew hastily to Paris to hold talks with government officials and Jewish leaders following the arson, and to visit the destroyed centre.

Benarroch sharply criticized the visit, telling JTA that "the Israelis should be more careful" and "shouldn't meddle in the internal affairs of the community."

Shalom "can't have it both ways," Benarroch said. "On the one hand he says he wants all French people to mobilize against anti-Semitism, but on the other Israel interferes, making it a Jewish issue. That's a contradictory position."

That said, Shalom last week was considerably more nuanced about the arson attack than many community leaders.

Visiting the burned-out building, Shalom told reporters that "we should leave the French authorities to conduct their investigation." He added that it was "of little importance what happened here when we know that during the last six months there have been more than 170 anti-Semitic incidents" in France.

The Consistoire's Cohen, though, issued a warning to the Jewish community.

"Sixty years after the Shoah, every anti-Semitic incident rightly goes to the community's head," he said. "When you cry wolf, you need to be very careful and ever vigilant. We are becoming less and less credible."

UN tells Syria to leave Lebanon, Hezbollah to disband

By SHLOMO SHAMIR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

UNITED NATIONS — The UN Security Council narrowly adopted a resolution last week calling for Syria's withdrawal from Lebanon and the disbanding of Hezbollah, and warning against outside interference in Beirut's upcoming presidential election.

The council voted 9-0 with six abstentions, the minimum vote possible, to approve the U.S-drafted resolution, after the United States and co-sponsor France agreed under pressure not to mention Syria by name.

Syria is the only country with foreign forces in Lebanon.

This is the first Security Council resolution clearly directed against an Arab state. It is also the first time the Security Council has addressed Hezbollah.

While Hezbollah is not mentioned by name, the resolution calls for the disbanding and disarming of all Lebanese and non-Lebanese militias. Diplomats and analysts said this is a direct allusion to Hezbollah.

U.S. Ambassador John Danforth said Israel has followed through on its commitment to withdraw from Lebanon, and now Syria must do so as well.

In response to the resolution, Mohammed Issa, Lebanon's secretary general for foreign affairs, said the 17,000 Syrian soldiers were there at the government's request to protect against "radical action emanating from Israel." The Syrian troops have been in Lebanon since the Lebanese civil war, which lasted from 1975 to 1990.

Angola, Benin, Britain, Chile, Germany, Romania and Spain joined the United States and France in voting in favour of the measure. Brazil, the Philippines, Russia, Pakistan, Algeria and China abstained from the vote.

The resolution, which also calls for "free and fair presidential elections," aims to head off a move in Lebanon's parliament to amend the constitution and extend the term of Syrian-backed Lebanese President Emile Lahoud for three years after his current six-year term expires in November.

"We believe Lebanon should be allowed to determine its own future and assume control of its own territory. Yet the Lebanese people are still unable to exercise their rights as a free people to make those choices and to take those steps as a nation," Danforth told the council.

"What the Lebanese people and we have witnessed over the past week in terms of Syrian actions is a crude mockery of this principle. It is clear that Lebanese parliamentarians have been pressured and even threatened by Syria and its agents to make them comply," he said.

A senior Lebanese official asked Security Council members to withdraw the resolution, saying the UN body had never before interfered in this manner in the internal affairs of a member-state.

Most abstaining council members said they agreed with Lebanon that the measure interfered in the country's internal affairs and would not contribute to a Middle East peace.

"This cannot be justified as part of the role given to the Security Council," Philippines Ambassador Lauro Baja said.

Syria's U.N. ambassador, Fayssal Mekdad, told reporters that Paris and Washington had "failed dramatically" in their mission because they had been obliged to rewrite the resolution to win its adoption.

ADL calls for probe of Pentagon 'mole' leak

By SHLOMO SHAMIR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — The Anti-Defamation League, one of the largest Jewish organizations in North America, last week called on the Bush administration to immediately appoint a special counsel to investigate the circumstances of leaks to the American media regarding suspicions of an alleged Israeli "mole" in the Pentagon.

"The one clear fact that can be agreed upon is that there was a malicious and targeted leak that is more damaging than the actual allegations of Israeli spying – allegations that in all likelihood are baseless," Abraham Foxman, national director of the ADL, told Ha'aretz.

"We will demand appointing a commission of inquiry to make every effort in identifying which official or officials are behind the leak," said Foxman, who is known to have close ties with administration and White House officials.

"A leak directed against a friendly country like Israel causes grave damage, and the current suspicions of spying damaged Israel, the local Jewish community, and relations between the two countries," Foxman said.

Foxman maintains that an official within the administration is responsible for the leak.

"Someone in the hierarchy is trying to ruin relations between Israel and the administration, and between Israel and the Jewish community," he said.

Argentina acquits five charged with Jewish centre bombing

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BUENOS AIRES — A federal court acquitted five men of charges of being accessories to the July 1994 bombing of a Jewish community centre here, the deadliest terrorist attack on Argentine soil, which claimed 85 lives and injured some 300 people.

In a nationally televised verdict, a three-judge panel cleared four former provincial police officers and a former used car salesman accused of supplying the van used in the attack.

Judge Miguel Pons read the long-awaited verdict, which cleared the suspects of all major charges after a nearly three-year-long trial – the longest in Argentine history.

A handful of representatives from the Jewish community, who had angrily protested for years about a lack of progress in the investigation, sat in the packed courthouse. They had no immediate comment as the lengthy verdict was still being read.

The bombing on July 18, 1994, killed 85 people and wounded 300 others as a van, rigged with explosives, levelled the Argentine Israeli Mutual Aid Association, known locally by its Spanish acronym "AMIA."

The five defendants were not accused of direct involvement in the bombing but were charged as accomplices for alleged roles in a stolen car ring that prosecutors said had delivered the white van used in the attack. Prosecutors had sought life sentences.

The explosion levelled the seven-storey building, a symbol of Argentina's 300,000-strong Jewish community, the largest in Latin America. The masterminds of the attack were never identified.

It was the second of two bombings targeting Jews in Argentina during the 1990s. A March 1992 blast destroyed the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires, killing 29 people in a case that remains unsolved.

Jewish and Argentine officials have charged the community centre bombing was linked to Islamic fundamentalists and pro-Iranian terrorists, charges denied by Tehran repeatedly.

After failing in efforts to extradite Iranian suspects wanted in the case, investigators have instead focused on what has been called "the local connection."

Legal experts have described the trial as the longest in the country's history. More than 1,200 witnesses were summoned or submitted written testimony during the non-jury trial.

Many families of the victims, angrily claiming the case had been botched by investigators, refused to attend Thursday's session.

Jewish leaders pointed to a decision by judicial officials earlier this year to remove a judge who led much of the investigation after accusations surfaced that he bribed a key witness. At least two prosecutors also were removed for alleged irregularities.

Jewish community leaders have accused the courts, the police and various Argentine governments of failing to carry out a proper investigation for fear it could lead to embarrassing revelations.

"This has been a long and painful process," said Marta Nercellas, a lawyer for some of the victims.

Those acquitted included Juan Jose Ribelli, a former Buenos Aires provincial police chief whom prosecutors alleged had been part of a ring that had supplied the van.

Carlos Alberto Telleldin, accused by investigators of being a stolen car dealer under Ribelli's protection, was another key defendant. He was accused of delivering the stolen van to the police gang members eight days before the bombing. The other defendants were Raul Ibarra, Anastasio Leal and Mario Bareiro.

Israel & the Jewish World

Preserving a forgotten heritage

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Dani BenWor, a man who once helped Jews escape from Ethiopia, now spends his time ensuring they never leave.

Only 20 years ago, thousands of Jews inhabited the mud and straw-thatched huts that still border the fields and house the villagers in the northern Ethiopian highlands, far from their brother and sister Jews in the West who only vaguely knew of their presence.

Then, in 1984 and 1991, the Israeli government airlifted tens of thousands of these Jews, the Beta Israel, filling airplanes to their capacity, in two separate operations – Operation Moses and Operation Solomon. Today there are almost 100,000 Ethiopian Jews living in Israel.

Dani BenWor

BenWor was one of the Ethiopian Jews who assisted the Israelis in 1991, for which he received a State of Israel Bronze Medal.

Since then, the huts have been reinhabited by Ethiopian Christians, the synagogues and cemeteries lie abandoned or destroyed, and the few written recordings of the prayers and traditions that defined a people are hidden away in government vaults, as if the Beta Israel were never there.

BenWor now works with the Society for the Study of Ethiopian Jewry and with the Ethiopian Beta Israel Memorial Museum to preserve the history of a people that once walked the northern hamlets and towns in the Gonder, Gojeam, Tigray and Wello regions.

"Our mission is to change the Ethiopian perception that Jewish heritage is a bad thing, by promoting the study of the history of the Beta Israel," BenWor said, as we walked through the town of Walleka, now a small Christian village that was once home to a Jewish community of potters and crafters.

Ethiopian Jews, who were called falashas (the exiled) by their Christian neighbours, were not allowed to own land or study at Ethiopian universities. Instead, they became known for their skills as craftspeople and artisans, and scholars now believe they were the workers who decorated the ancient castles and palaces in the Gonder area.

As in most Beta Israel villages, a river flows by the outskirts of Walleka, the flowing waters once used for ritual bathing. On the other side, lies a Jewish cemetery, accessible only after a few strategically placed boulders are pushed into the waters by our entourage of Walleka children.

The cemetery contains marked and unmarked graves of more than 1,000 Jews, many of whom never knew that Jerusalem was a real place, not just a metaphor for religious freedom.

BenWor is determined that these people and their heritage will not be forgotten.

In January 2002, the Museum of the Institute of Ethiopian Studies agreed to set aside an area to display Beta Israel artifacts and historical records. However, when enough money is raised, the Ethiopian Beta Israel Memorial Museum intends to open a separate space in the Institute of Ethiopian Studies at Addis Ababa University, establish a research centre and a library of original works and videos, and display the pottery, ironworks and ceremonial dresses worn by Ethiopian Jews, BenWor also hopes to include a six-volume, hand-written collection of Beta Israel prayers currently locked in a vault in the Ethiopian National Library.

The prayers were written in Ge'ez [predecessor of Amharic, the current national language] and are one of the few written instances of an oral tradition that may vanish with the generation of elders that now live in Israel, BenWor explains.

The museum is also planning to renovate synagogues and cemeteries so that tourists and families will be able to reach them easily.

In October, the Society for the Study of Ethiopian Jewry is planning a conference where academic papers, photographs and videos will be presented. The conference will focus on the question of how Ethiopia acquired Judaism.

Some scholars have argued that before Christianity took root in the fourth century, all Ethiopians practised a form of Judaism based on the Hebrew Bible. Religion and politics combined as Christianity expanded in eastern Africa with the Ethiopian Empire. Experts claim that it was natural for the new religion to absorb within it many of the Jewish practices it came to displace.

Today, the connections between Ethiopian Christianity and Judaism are so strong that some people joke that if you meet Ethiopians who don't eat pork, observe the Sabbath and wear a Star of David, you know they're Christian.

Book profiles the rock stars of David

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Norman Greenbaum, who wrote the 1970s hit Spirit in the Sky with its evangelical verse, "I got a friend in Jesus," still gets a dozen e-mails a week from people asking him if he's Jewish.

The answer is yes. And not a messianic one either. "I grew up kissing a mezuzah on the way into the house," he says in Stars of David, and still identifies as a Jew.

This is one of the interesting tidbits found in Stars of David: Rock 'n' Roll's Jewish Stories by Scott R. Benarde (Brandeis).

The book contains three to five page profiles of around 60 rock stars (some famous, others not so much), focusing mainly on their Jewishness. We learn that many Jewish rockers are more in tune with their Judaism than we might think.

The flamboyant former singer of Van Halen, David Lee Roth, went to Hebrew school, and a Jewish camp and had a bar mitzvah.

"As difficult as being Jewish may have been for him, Roth never tried to conceal his roots," Benarde writes. "Roth was a rock star who wasn't going to assimilate to join a club or increase his popularity."

Bon Jovi's keyboard player David Bryan (Rashbaum) is a lifelong member of Temple Emanu-El in New Jersey. He attended Hebrew school and had his bar mitzvah. On tour, he fasts on Yom Kippur and seeks out a synagogue in whatever town the band is playing.

The song All You Zombies, written by Jewish songwriter/ producer Rick Chertoff and performed by The Hooters (two of the group's members, Eric Bazilian and Rob Hyman are Jewish) is about Moses, Noah and the birth of Judaism.

Popular touring act Phish has performed Jewish songs like Avinu Malancu and Yerushalaim Shel Zahav. Their bassist/ vocalist Mike Gordon has had a Jewish education and upbringing and says in the book that playing music is literally a religious experience.

"I like to be in touch with the spiritual nature of what I do and I think my Jewish upbringing led to that sensitivity," he says.

These are just some of the musicians profiled. Others include Billy Joel, Melissa Manchester, Yes guitarist Trevor Rabin and, of course, Bob Dylan.

Some of the "stars" profiled are rather obscure, however, and other notables such as Barry Manilow, Art Garfunkel, Paul Simon and KISS's Paul Stanley and Gene Simmons are not included.

Benarde spent five years researching, conducting interviews and compiling the information for this book, and he admits that their are some obvious omissions.

"During the five years that I researched the book, I repeatedly contacted just about every other household name that's not in the book," he told me recently. He said Paul Simon's management never returned his calls, while Garfunkel declined.

"Carole King, Bette Midler and Barbra Streisand would not do it for one reason or another...same with Barry Manilow and Joey Ramone. Billy Joel did the same, but I had enough information to write an insightful chapter on him."

At some point, he said, he had to stop researching and go ahead with the project. "Despite the omission of some superstars, I think it's more comprehensive and informative than any of the other books of this kind."

Originally intended to be more of an encyclopedia "with short paragraphs on everyone I cold possibly discover, once I began getting these incredible stories, I changed my focus. The Jewish stories had to be told." Benarde said.

Overall, this book belongs on a coffee table during a gathering of friends. Someone is bound to pick it up, flip through it and say, "What? The dude who wrote 'I got a friend in Jesus', is Jewish?"

Ironically, Greenbaum followed up his Jesus song with a song about treif – Canned Ham.

"AND I STILL SEE THEIR FACES" EXHIBIT RECALLS LOST PRE-HOLOCAUST WORLD

"And I Still See Their Faces," an exhibit of some 450 photographs of Polish Jews from the prewar era that has already been shown in more than 20 cities worldwide, opened recently in the Galleria in Toronto's BCE Place.

Preserved by friends, neighbours and sometimes strangers, the photos were selected from more than 8,000 sent to Jewish actress Golda Tencer after a nationally televised appeal in Poland in 1994. The Toronto show was organized by the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation.

Several Torontonians have already made deeply emotional discoveries after seeing the exhibition album.

A member of the Jewish Genealogical Society of Toronto, originally from a town called Drobnin, found numerous class photos of his sister, who had perished in Auschwitz along with the rest of their family. Rabbi Dow Marmur and his wife, Fredzia, discovered a photograph of her father, Isaac Zonabend, showing him as a young Chassid engrossed in a volume of Talmud. (Zonabend survived the Holocaust.)

"And I Still See Their Faces" remains on view in BCE Place to Sept. 15.

Art Show at Israel's: Myriam Nafte is a forensic anthropologist and visual artist often called upon to assist with criminal investigations. Her detailed paintings and drawings have been exhibited in Canada and the United States.

In a clear departure from her anatomical work, Nafte began apprenticing with her father, Max Bensabat, an artist and scribe. Under his guidance, she has produced a series of exquisite paintings, combining rich text with saturated layers of colour. According to the Globe and Mail, Nafte "has the cool detachment of a scientist and the passionate attention to detail of an artist."

Nafte's works go on display at Israel's Judaica, 870 Eglinton Ave. W., Sunday, Sept. 12, 2 to 5 p.m. Artist's talk, 3 p.m. Refreshments, no admission charge. 416-256-2858, ext. 22.

Islamic Terrorism explored in Global TV documentary

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Previous wars in history have had clearly defined front lines.

But the war the West has faced since the Sept. 11, 2001 Al Qaeda terrorist attacks in the United State is far different.

Know Your Enemy, a revealing Global TV documentary scheduled to be broadcast on Tuesday, Sept. 14, at 10 p.m., unfolds on the basis of this theme.

According to host Kevin Newman and a team of correspondents reporting from the United States, Pakistan, Bosnia and Britain, this war could last generations.

The new enemy, radical Islam as personified by Al Qaeda, transcends borders and festers in the hearts of resentful Muslims who hate the West and seek the overthrow of western governments.

Newman claims that Al Qaeda was founded in Peshawar, a city in northwestern Pakistan. Its guiding light, Abdullah Azzam, was a Palestinian Islamic scholar and jihadist who called on Muslims the world over to fight the Soviet army that had invaded Afghanistan in 1979.

One of Azzam's acolytes, Osama bin Laden, felt that if Islamic warriors could defeat a superpower like the Soviet Union in Afghanistan, they could surely stand up to the United States.

Newman says Al Qaeda first tested its theory in Somalia, a failed state on the horn of Africa. There an American Blackhawk helicopter was shot down attempting to rescue stranded U.S. soldiers in the capital, Mogadishu.

In 1996, after trying to topple the World Trade Center in Manhattan, Al Qaeda declared war on the United States, the ultimate infidel power.

After finally destroying the twin towers, Al Qaeda gloated. But Al Qaeda lost its base in Afghanistan after the Americans invaded that underdeveloped country and sent the Taliban – bin Laden's patron – packing.

Bin Laden and his associates escaped to Pakistan, where radical Islam enjoys wide support and admiration, and there they remain beyond the reach of the United States.

Although the Pakistani government is officially a U.S. ally in the war against international terrorism, jihadist schools flourish in Pakistan, incubating and producing Islamists.

The government has bulldozed some of these schools and arrested a number of jihadi leaders, but to no real avail.

"Jihad is our religious faith," an anti-American religious school teacher says.

> 'Jihad is our religious faith'

New recruits to the cause are chosen in such schools, but a new generation of terrorists is also being recruited in cyberspace, the new frontier of anti-Western hatred.

We're told that Bosnia, a province in what was once Yugoslavia, may become an Al Qaeda base and a breeding ground for terrorism.

In fact, several terror cells have been uncovered there in the past few years.

Islamic influence is growing in Bosnia as more mosques are built with Saudi and Iranian funds.

"A Muslim always has to be ready for jihad," says a young bearded Bosnian, speaking either for himself or for many Bosnians like himself.

Al Qaeda is also implanting itself in Britain, and officials there assume that a big attack is imminent.

The vast majority of British Muslims are law-abiding citizens. But a few, such as renegade imam Shiekh Abu Hamza, who was recently arrested and charged with mobilizing support for Al Qaeda, leave a far different impression.

In summation, Newman warns that Islamism of the kind disseminated by Al Qaeda may be difficult to crush by means of military force.

Less than two weeks ago, President George W. Bush of the United States was asked whether total victory against terrorism is possible.

"I don't think you can win it [that war]," he replied.

Preoccupied with the imbroglio in Iraq, Bush may have been unduly pessimistic.

Terrorism can be defeated, and Know Your Enemy proffers a solution.

Al Qaeda, an eminently adaptable organization, has been notoriously hard to penetrate. But if western intelligence agencies recruit Muslims loyal to western values, Al Qaeda can be brought to heel.

It is a message to heed.

Teenager stars in new animated show

Isen says that although Atomic Betty is going to be aired in 55 countries in addition to Canada, she thinks it's pretty cool that she's part of an all-Canadian cast.

"I'm the only child in the cast. They are all experienced adult actors and a lot of them are comedians. It is so much fun to be in the studio with them because they are so funny. I always have such a great time recording.

"I'm there with my script and my microphone," says the avid reader, who just completed her Grade 6 Royal Conservatory of Music piano exam and recently celebrated her bat mitzvah.

"A lot of people often ask me if I have to memorize my lines, but I don't. When I first started, I thought it was very strange that other actors I would be recording with kept moving around so much, but I really learned that it benefits the acting to act it out while you are recording in the studio."

Teletoon has released a CD called Toon Trax 2 on Sony, which includes a Teletoon cartoon builder CD-Rom. The artists on this album are impressive and include singers Beyonce, Mandy Moore, Kelly Clarkson, Jessica Simpson and Isen.

"The Atomic Betty theme song is on the Toon Trax 2 CD. It is quite an honour to be there with some of the names on that CD. The theme song is actually very catchy, written by Kevin Gillis and Jack Lenz. It is going to be part of an Atomic Betty music CD, that is going to be coming out," Isen says.

In addition to starting Grade 8 at Venture Park School in Thornhill, Ont., in September, Isen will also be back in the studio to do another animated series, Nelvana's Jane and the Dragon, a Canadian/British co-production. Isen will give voice to Jane, a 13-year-old knight.

Isen says she also hopes to do more acting.

"It is hard to compare stage, acting on television and voice, because they are so different. [In] theatre, you have this thrill that whatever happens, happens – you only do it once and it's live. With television and voice, you can always go over it again, but I love it just as much."

The Ninth Day sheds light on a little-known aspect of the Holocaust

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Ninth Day, Volker Schlondorff's sensitive and uplifting film about an intriguing footnote in the Holocaust, pits a resolute Catholic cleric against an ardent Gestapo official in a momentous moral struggle.

The German-language movie, with English sub-titles, will be shown at this year's Toronto International Film Festival. It will be screened at the Ryerson on Monday, Sept. 13 at 9:30 pm and again at the Varsity 8 on Wednesday, Sept. 15 at 3: 30 pm.

Based on a true story that pays tribute to priests who opposed the Nazis, The Ninth Day takes place in the winter of 1942 and unfolds in Germany and German-occupied Luxembourg.

Henri Kremer (Ulrich Mattes), a priest, a member of the resistance movement and the scion of a prominent local family, is arrested and summarily shipped to Dachau.

It is not immediately clear why he has been consigned to Dachau, a bleak and brutal concentration camp in Germany whose demonic essence cinematographer Tomas Erhart captures with a few telling shots.

Gaunt and forlorn, Kremer finds himself in the company of a group of priests and Catholic scholars who have crossed the Nazis. Bertram, one of Dachau's commandants, is the stereotypical Nazi tyrant who takes pleasure in beating and demeaning the prisoners.

To his surprise, and for no apparent reason, Kremer, number 25639, is suddenly set free. At the end of his train journey, he is picked up by Gebhardt, (August Diehl), a young, well-spoken SS officer who had ordered his release.

Before taking Kremer home to be tearfully reunited with his brother, sister and brother-in-law, Gebhardt asks him to report to his office the following morning.

A cool and calculating character, Gebhardt has been ordered to co-opt Kremer and his recalcitrant bishop to the Nazi cause. If Kremer fails, he will be sent back to Dachau in nine days.

Kremer, however, is a tough nut to crack. He scoffs at anti-Semitic Nazi race theories and believes that Christinity owes a great theological debt to Jews.

Believing he can sway Kremer, Gebhardt argues that Christianity has moved far beyond Judaism and that Germany is engaged in an historic crusade against atheistic Bolshevism that the church should support unequivocally.

Gebhardt wants Kremer to convince his reclusive bishop – who despises Nazi theories of race and blood – to stop ringing his church bells in his passive rebellion against Nazi rule. More to the point, he wants Kremer to write a pro-Nazi statement.

To Gebhardt, this exercise in pursuasion seems like a no-brainer. Is not the Soviet Union, Germany's arch enemy, rabidly anti-religious? Has Stalin not torn down churches and murdered priests?

These are tantalizing arguments, and the bishop's secretary has bought into them. But will Kremer, assaulted by nightmares and flashbacks of Dachau, abandon his principles and accommodate himself to the Nazis?

Meanwhile, Kremer's influential family, which has lucrative commercial ties with Germany, tries to convince him to solve his dilemma by fleeing to neutral Switzerland.

The Ninth Day, a serious and thoughtful film bolstered by blistering performances from Mattes and Diehl, succeeds in conveying the tension and drama surrounding Gebhardt's intellectual duel with Kremer.

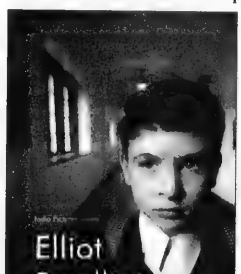
Just as importantly, Schlondorff sheds light on a little-known aspect of the Holocaust.

An endearing comedy from Anita Doron

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Elliot Smelliot, an endearing short by Toronto's Anita Doron, revolves around a precocious 12-year-old Jewish boy struggling to be a man.

This modest 23-minute film will be screened at the Toronto International Film Festival on Sept. 14 at 8:45 p.m. (Cumberland 3) and on Sept. 16 at 9:45 a.m. (Varsity 7)



Michael Kanev

Elliot Graf (Michael Kanev), a red-haired boy wonder, is a third-year university science student who develops a crush for Kate May (Amy Rutherford), a 20-year-old blonde bombshell who requires tutoring in chemistry.

As he sounds off about crystal systems, Boyle's Law, polymers and diffusion, Elliot constructs a fantasy about the possibilities of a romantic relationship with Kate.

The seemingly perfect woman, she is bubbly and nice, and better still, she admires Elliot's formidable intelligence.

"How'd you learn all this stuff?" she asks in a dewy-eyed demonstration of her boundless admiration and affection.

As test tubes boil and flames flicker in the background, Elliot's imagination runs wild.

In his mind's eye, Kate leans over and plants a gentle kiss on his forehead.

Before he knows it, they are sharing a pleasant pasta meal at Kate's favourite Italian restaurant.

But even in his gauzy dreams, Elliot realizes he is still a child and cannot push his imaginary liaison to "the next level."

Directed by Doron and written by Jonathan Orson, Elliot Smelliot is a blithe comedy whose subliminal theme transcends all boundaries of age and gender.

And its appeal is enhanced by actors whose chemistry is clearly self-evident.

Eisner pioneered the adult graphic novel

By SHLOMO SCHWARTZBERG
Special to The CJN

Interviewing Will Eisner is like having access to virtually the whole history of the comic book medium.

The career of the 87-year-old writer and artist, and creator of the adult graphic novel, spans more than 60 years of comic book history, beginning with his creation of The Spirit comic in 1940. But there's more to his story than just the obvious benchmarks that he's known for.

The New York-born Eisner, who was guest of honour at Toronto's recent Comicon convention, really began his foray into the field when he was still in his teens, first in high school, where he published a strip in the school newspaper, and then afterward in a comic titled WOW What a Magazine!.

In 1940, he was approached by a syndicate to create a comic magazine insert for a Sunday newspaper.

"The most important reason I would do it was I believed that this medium is a valid literary form and that I wanted to write to adults," Eisner says. At that time, comics were still ghettoized as kids' stuff, even by many of the people who were writing them.

"I wanted to get out of the comic ghetto," he adds, and The Spirit was his way of doing so.

Though nominally a superhero, Eisner never saw The Spirit that way. "He only wore a mask because the syndicate insisted he be in costume," he says emphatically.

Instead, The Spirit, a cop named Denny Colt who was left for dead after an attack, relied on his agility and strength, functioning more as a detective in his fight against crime.

The Spirit comic was also notable for its artistic innovations, including creative use of black and white in the panels and highly dramatic covers.

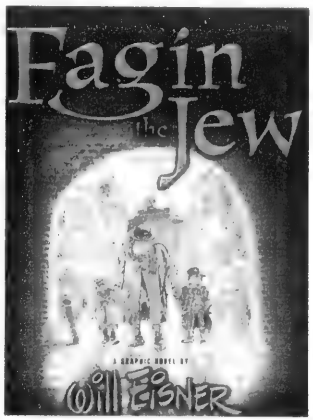
Eisner is a rare talent who both draws his panels and writes dialogue; usually those aspects of the comic are divided among two or more people. He's also one of the few comic book creators who did not change his name. "Most of the other guys, Jewish boys, changed their name [to assimilate])," he says.

Eisner was drafted into the army in 1942 and pioneered the use of comics for training purposes, but he kept The Spirit going until 1952. "I shut it down because of economic reasons, the cost of newsprint was rising to such a degree that the newspapers couldn't afford to pay for it," he says.

Thus ended the first part of his comics career, though he insists, "I was never part of that comic book world."

For about 20 years, he produced educational materials, for schools and for such clients as the Army Motor Corps. Then "in late 1972, I stumbled into a comics convention, where I ran into a group of guys who were underground cartoonists, [including] Art Spiegelman [later the creator of the Holocaust-themed Maus] and Robert Crumb [creator of Fritz the Cat]," Eisner says.

"I had an epiphany because I suddenly realized that these guys were using comics as literature, they were combating the establishment, discussing sex and drugs and so forth," which was a far cry from the superheroes and imaginary worlds that were prevalent in the genre.



Eisner decided to spend a year working on his first book, A Contract with God (1978), which received critical acclaim and has never gone out of print. "I'm shamelessly proud of that," Eisner says.

Eisner came up with the term "graphic novel" to describe A Contract with God, which became the name given to the work done by him and others that followed.

Graphic novels were comics that tackled taboos in sex, language and story lines, used unconventional artistic techniques and owed as much to politics, history and literature as they did to popular culture.

Today, Eisner prefers to call them "graphic literature or graphic narrative, or graphic history. All books are not novels."

He's also seen his belief in the genre's possibilities vindicated by writers such as Neil Gaiman (Sandman), Alan Moore (Watchmen) and Art Spiegelman, who have brought "maturity" and literary qualities to the medium. They, in turn, have saluted him as the influential father of the form.

A Contract with God, a group of stories revolving around the inhabitants of a 1930s New York City tenement, set forth the template for the dozen or so graphic books that followed (Eisner spends a year or so on each one): realistic, simply but effectively drawn tales of ordinary people, struggling to get through life, with many of the books (including Dropsie Avenue and New York: The Big City) set in his beloved – and richly populated – New York.

"I'm more interested in the human condition, and telling stories about real life," he says.

Like many of his books, Eisner's first graphic novel is also very Jewish in tone and characterization, ironic in that he never put any of his religious background into The Spirit, even though that comic did offer one of the first positive non-stereotypical portrayals of an African-American, a young boy named Ebony.

The Jewish content in his work is no big deal, says Eisner. "I was given a lifetime achievement award from the National Foundation for Jewish Culture [a few years ago]. I pointed out to them that I was not in the business of promoting Jewish culture necessarily. I write what I know, any writer worth his salt [does that]. I know about Jewish life; I know about Jewish culture; I write about that."

Eisner's "Jewish" books are notable for their warts-and-all portraits of his people, which, to my mind, puts him in the same category as Mordecai Richler and Philip Roth.

That complexity of characterization, says Eisner, is normal for him. "It's my nature. [Cartoonist] Jules Feiffer used to work for me. One argument we used to have is he said, the trouble with you is you see everything in grey. Your villains are always half villains, not full villains. One of the reasons I never became a political cartoonist is I would always see the other guy's point of view," he adds with a laugh.

That disclaimer aside, his works can be political in nature, such as in his most recent and most explicitly historical book, Fagin, the Jew. It recasts the stereotypical Jewish thief and villain in a sympathetic light and directly addresses the anti-Semitic undercurrents running through Charles Dickens' Oliver Twist, which infamously introduced Fagin to the world.

Eisen doesn't consider Dickens himself an anti-Semite. "He wasn't anti-Semitic; Dickens apologized [about the portrayal] after," he says. But the book always troubled him.

"The mistake Dickens made was that he referred to Fagin throughout as The Jew. He didn't refer to Sykes, the villain, as The Gentile, the Irishman… " says Eisner. But "the real crime," was by the book's illustrator, George Cruikshank, who portrayed Fagin as a "swarthy hook-nosed" character, even though the Ashkenazi Fagin would likely not even have looked obviously Jewish.

"It hit me, this was all wrong and it needed to be addressed. It also opened up a new opportunity for me, a new direction for my work."

Fagin, the Jew functions as a skilful response to an issue Eisner feels strongly about and also manages to reinvent and reinterpret Dickens' novel, while still remaining faithful to its structure and story.

Eisner's next graphic narrative continues in the same vein. The Plot, due out next spring, deals with the truth and background behind the infamous 19th-century forgery, The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, which ostensibly set forth the Jewish plot to rule the world and which has been used against the Jews ever since.

Meticulously researched, The Plot, which Eisner expects will run to about 130 pages, will, he hopes, reach the ordinary folk who might be most susceptible to the Protocols' anti-Semitic message.

Eisner has no idea what he's going to do after The Plot is finished but, even at his advanced age, and despite some "aches and pains," he's still going strong. "Fortunately, at my age, I'm still healthy and still around, and I'm still eager to work," he says.

Researchers warn against oral suction during circumcision

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

An ancient procedure that is part of ritual circumcisions, one that has been found to spread herpes and other dangerous illnesses, is still used in Toronto, though infrequently.

Oral metzitzah, the practice in which a mohel sucks blood from an infant's circumcised penis, has been supplanted by more hygienic and effective ways of cleaning the wound, said Dr. Aaron Jesin, a Toronto-based mohel. While metzitzah remains a required part of the circumcision ritual, most practitioners employ a glass tube to clean the wound, he said.

However, there are groups in Toronto today who continue to employ mohels who use oral metzitzah, said Rabbi Moshe Mordechai Lowy, a spokesman for the Orthodox Va'ad Harabonim in Toronto. "Those in the Torah world, the yeshiva world, use the procedure, unless there's a problem," he said.

Ancient procedure found to spread herpes, other dangerous illnesses still being used in Toronto

Last month, a group of researchers in Canada and Israel published a report in the medical journal Pediatrics, which found eight babies who were infected with the herpes virus likely contracted their illnesses through oral metzitzah. Most of the infants were found in Israel but one, who was circumcised in 1994, was from Toronto.

The researchers' report, published in the journal's Aug. 2 edition, stated that in the cases studied, infection was transmitted by the mohel to the infant orally. All the mohels involved in the circumcisions tested positive for the herpes antibody.

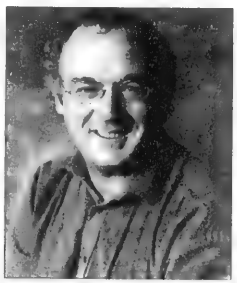
Rabbi Moshe Mordechai Lowy

One of the children became seriously ill with encephalitis, while the Toronto baby spent 26 days in hospital, the report noted.

"Our findings provide evidence that ritual Jewish circumcision with oral metzitzah may cause oral-genital transmission of HSV infection, resulting in clinical disease... Furthermore, oral suction may not only endanger the child but also may expose the mohel to human immuno-deficiency virus or hepatitis B from infected infants. The same conclusion that led the talmudic sages once to establish the custom of metzitzah for the sake of the infant could now be applied to persuade the mohel to use instrumental suction," the researchers concluded.

Dr. Gideon Koren, professor in the department of clinical pharmacology and toxicology at the Hospital for Sick Children and the University of Toronto, is one of the authors of the report. He believes "some mohels still use their mouths for suction, but [they] use plastic pipes."

Even in Israel, he said, oral suction is employed "by a small minority and by all accounts, the rabbanut [rabbinic councils] told them to stop it. It's not a system that mainstream Judaism uses. I wouldn't even imagine a backward and primitive procedure [like that] still exists."



Dr. Gideon Koren

Given the existence of anti-Semitism, "the last thing we need is people to say Jews are abusing children," Koren added.

Jesin said he used oral metzitzah a few times when he first began as a mohel in 1978 but soon gave it up. He now uses a glass tube, which, he said, complies with the Gemarah requirement "to draw the blood from the far places [within the wound]."

Jesin cited renowned halachic authority Rabbi Moshe Tendler of Yeshiva University's department of talmudic law and Jewish medical ethics, who asserts it is forbidden to perform metzitzah without an instrument.

Speaking from New York, Rabbi Tendler, one of the report's co-authors, said the procedural elements of ritual circumcision are contained in the Talmud, which breaks down circumcision into three parts. In the first, orla, the foreskin is removed, while in the second, priah, the mucous layer is removed. The third part, metzitzah is clearly "a medical requirement, not a ritual requirement," and can therefore even be performed on the Sabbath, he said.

With advances in medical techniques and knowledge, mohels are required by Jewish law to do what is in the baby's best interests, and that would mean following current medical thinking and avoiding oral suction of the penis, Rabbi Tendler said.

Rabbi Tendler said most mohels comply with this approach, but some chassidic groups, including Satmars and Lubavitch, still employ traditional methods.

Rabbi Lowy acknowledged that "haredim or those who feel they still want to go with the old way of thousands of years [of tradition] and they feel the mohel is careful" accept oral metzitzah.

He mentioned the Satmar, Bobov, Lubavitch and other communities who generally comply with the traditional way of performing metzitzah.

A 1990 book by Rabbi Yonason Binyomin Goldberger made the case for oral metzitzah and included kabbalisitc reasons for doing so, he continued. At the time, the practice was endorsed by a number of doctors, Rabbi Lowy said.

In 1994, when the Toronto baby took sick, the Va'ad Harabonim investigated the case and issued a brief statement saying that "there is no clinical basis in ceasing to perform metzitzah b'peh (orally)." However, the rabbinical council also stated if the mohel exhibits cold sores, lesions or flu, oral metzitzah should be avoided, he added.

Koren suggested that as good consumers, Jewish parents should ask mohels what technique they plan to use and govern their choices accordingly.

Dr. Rochelle Schwartz, Toronto's second female mohelet, said Reform practitioners employ a clamp that permits a small amount of bleeding, and then they draw the blood with sterile gauze. She also uses a powder to cauterize the wound.

Schwartz, who has performed ritual circumcisions for eight years, said there are safer ways of performing metzitzah than by using the mouth. "It's really very unhygienic. I can't see a value in it."

The mouth, she continued, is loaded with bacteria, and most mohels would be unaware if they are developing a cold sore.

"Yes, it's traditional but it's also a surgical procedure. You want to keep the area as clean and hygienic and sterile as possible," she said.

Rabbi Moshe Tendler

Schwartz's father, Harry, recalls how the practice of metzitzah was performed on his brother, with disastrous consequences. In 1919 in the small Polish town of Tyrava, between Krakow and Lvov, an older brother was born. As his parents related the story to him, a mohel employed the traditional method of metzitzah on his brother. Unfortunately the mohel had a mouth full of rotting teeth and an infection was passed on to his brother, who died a few days later.

There was nothing to be done for his brother, Schwartz recalled, but times have changed since then. "My grandmother was 65 years old, got pneumonia and the doctor said there was nothing to do and she passed away. Now, a pneumonia is nothing," he said, noting the advances in medical science.

The Pediatrics report was published as the collaborative effort of several researchers: Benjamin Gesundheit, Galia Grisaru-Soen, David Greenberg, Osnat Levtzion-Korach, David Malkin, Martin Petric, Koren, Rabbi Tendler, Bruria Ben-Zeev, Amir Vardi, Ron Dagan and Dan Engelhard.

Hall of Fame celebrates Jewish major leaguers

By PETER EPHROSS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

COOPERSTOWN, N.Y. — Sandy Koufax isn't the only major league baseball player who refused to pitch on Yom Kippur.

It was the fall of 1963, and Larry Yellen was slated to make his major league debut for the Houston Colt .45s against the New York Mets when he received a call from his mother.

"Larry," Yellen remembers his mother saying, "I read about it in the paper. You're embarrassing us. It's Yom Kippur."

Yellen hewed to the fifth commandment and respected his mother's wishes: He told his general manager that he couldn't pitch and sat the game out.

Yellen's story hasn't received much publicity, most likely because his major league career was short – in fact, he only pitched in 14 big league games before his career ended in 1964.

But the cloud of obscurity surrounding Yellen and other Jewish players is beginning to clear.

A series of events – sparked by the publication of the first-ever complete set of Jewish major leaguer baseball cards and culminating in a historic two-day event held at Baseball's Hall of Fame in upstate New York recently – is shining the spotlight on professional Jewish ballplayers.

It all began with a frustrated baseball card collector.

Depending on which list you choose to follow, there have been somewhere from 140 to 160 Jews who have played major league baseball since the late 19th century.

In 1999, while assembling his collection, Martin Abramowitz realized that a host of players were not included – either because they played in an era when cards weren't produced or because they didn't play long enough to merit one.

After he complained about the players who didn't have cards, his son, Jacob, suggested he make his own.

The result: a 142-card set – available at www.ajhs.org – that sold out its run of 15,000 by the end of Chanukah.

Beginning with Lipman Pike, who played in the 1870s and is believed to have been the first professional Jewish baseball player, Jewish players have made their mark on the baseball diamond. Like Yellen, many of the Jewish players are obscure, known only to the most ardent followers of Jewish sports.

None of them enjoyed careers as spectacular as Hall of Famers Koufax or Hank Greenberg, a slugger in the 1930s and '40s, but most hung around in the big leagues for a bit longer than Yellen.

After a dry spell in the 1980s, there has been a renaissance of Jewish major leaguers in recent years. Depending on what standard of Jewishness is applied, there are currently between 10 to 12 members of the tribe playing pro ball, led by Los Angeles Dodgers star outfielder and first baseman Shawn Green.

In fact, according to Abramowitz' own research, Jewish players historically have a higher collective batting average and the pitchers have a better won-loss record when compared with all players.

Perhaps just as important, baseball has served as a microcosm of the American Jewish experience.

Like many of the professions in which Jews have worked, baseball was a field – a particularly public one – in which Jews tried "to make a name for ourselves while maintaining a sense of Jewish identity," Abramowitz says.

Harry Danning, 92, is the oldest living testament to that balancing act. Danning, an all-star catcher for the New York Giants in the 1930s, said he wasn't bothered too much as a Jewish player. After all, he says, there were three other Jews on the team.

Sure, he says, there were "bench jockeys" who needled him about his large nose – "Pitch under his nose, he can't see the ball," he remembers them saying – but they got on all the players.

Once, when a hotel in Florida refused during spring training to house Danning and another Jewish Giant, Phil Weintraub, the team's manager, Bill Terry, said he would house the entire team elsewhere unless the hotel took the whole squad. The hotel acceded to Terry's request.

Danning, who lives in Valparaiso, Ind., was unable to attend the conference because of his age.

Aware that a few players have died in the past year alone, Abramowitz is already planning his next project: creating an archive of interviews with Jewish ex-major leaguers.

"We have to get these players before they're long gone," Abramowitz says.

The Hall of Fame's "Celebration of 143 American Jews in America's Game" – even though there are only 142 cards – was attended by 300 participants from as far away as San Francisco. The event featured a trivia quiz and a clinic for kids, discussions on Koufax and Greenberg and panels with eight Jewish former players.

Sandy Koufax

It would be easy to say that the event was simply a milestone for Jews "making it" in the United States. After all, the weekend was the first ethnic event held at the hall – and the food served under a tent outside the red-brick building was certainly the first large-scale kosher meal served there.

The truth, however, is that Jewish ballplayers don't fall into simple categories. Of the eight, two were converts: Bob Tufts, a pitcher with a short-lived career in the 1980s, and Elliott Maddox, a black player who converted to Judaism while playing in the 1970s. (No, despite persistent rumors, Hall of Famer Rod Carew did not convert, although he married a Jewish woman and his children were raised as Jews.)

After he converted, Maddox joked, "Instead of having everyone call me a shvartze, they called me a Jew."

As the players recounted tales from their playing days, some focused on their Jewish backgrounds.

Mike Epstein, a slugging first baseman in the 1960s and '70s, explained how he got his nickname.

After he hit a mammoth home run in a minor league game, the opposing team's manager said, "Nobody's going to catch that, Super Jew."

The team's batboy heard the remark and the next day all of Epstein's jerseys, undershirts and caps had Super Jew written all over them.

Epstein, who inscribed a Star of David on his first baseman's glove and spikes as a talisman, said he took the nickname proudly.

Aside from pitcher Ken Holtzman, who was raised in a Conservative home in St. Louis and had his bar mitzvah in an Orthodox shul, none of these Jewish athletes was brought up in an observant family. Holtzman said his wife kept kosher at home during his career but he found it impossible to do so on the road.

Still, the Jewishness of the eight was on display by virtue of their attending the conference, and it was occasionally displayed in odd, funny ways.

On the second day of the conference, the players held a clinic for the kids in attendance. The former players and the kids spread out over two baseball diamonds, where they worked on hitting, pitching, fielding and running the bases.

Parents appreciated the Jewish aspect of the conference.

"Judaism is important in our lives. Sports are important in our kids' lives. I think it's important to connect the two," says Carol Prushan, who came to the conference from Philadelphia with her husband and two sons.

As for the kids, they didn't seem to think Blomberg's question was strange at all. Some of them yelled out "egg," others screamed "regular" as they waited eagerly for their next turn at bat.

Rosh Hashanah soccer date to stay

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — A European soccer official has refused to change an international soccer match involving Israel that is scheduled to be played on Rosh Hashanah.

"We cannot accept when everyone starts using national, religious or political holidays as an argument for rescheduling matches," a Union of European Football Association (UEFA) official was quoted as saying recently. "So now the people in Israel have to decide between synagogue and football."

Germany's foreign minister, Joschka Fischer, said he would try to have the Sept. 15 date changed.

Maccabi Tel Aviv said it had asked UEFA to change the date, but UEFA said the club had missed a deadline for filing a change request. Maccabi denied it had missed the deadline.

Flips, tricks and tall trees

Last year, I was at a shiva for my friend's grandfather. It was a time of sorrow and mourning for her and her family. Yet somehow, among all the sadness, I heard a beautiful story about a spiritual journey that touched my heart and has stayed with me ever since.

something

By MIRIAM PORTER

I stood in the corner of the dining room nibbling party sandwiches on a white paper plate while the men were davening Ma'ariv in the next room. When they were done, the rabbi called the rest of us to come in. Grieving relatives and friends gathered around and I stood at the back trying not to make eye contact with anyone. (I never know which consoling words to say at a shiva, but I feel such a deep sadness for the family's loss.) I looked at the old fashioned flowered couch with removed cushions and then up to the grandmother's torn black ribbon. The rabbi spoke directly to my friend's grandmother, but I felt as if he was speaking to me.

His story began with two twin babies inside a mother's womb. These twins had spent their entire lives together. They loved each other. They trusted each other. All they knew was each other. One day, their mother went into labour. The first baby was born and entered its new world. The second baby was still inside the mother. The unborn baby's whole world was shattered when its twin left. It did not understand why they were separated or how long it would last. No one could explain to this baby what happened.

The first-born baby wants to contact and comfort its twin, but it can't. All it can do is wait for its arrival. It wants to scream and shout and laugh because the new world is extraordinary. The baby still waiting to be born must have faith they will be together again one day.

The same can be said when someone we love passes away. They represent the first baby and we are the babies they cannot contact, the ones left behind. All we can do is have faith that they are safe and happy.

The rabbi finished his story and I had salty tears on my cheeks, but I felt calm and peaceful. I believe that one day I will be re-united with Zaide Porter, my grandfather who volunteered as a clown and always made me laugh. I will also see my Grandpa Saltzman, who was so generous and a good friend to everyone.

I believe my beautiful cat, Willow, who lived 17 wonderful years, will be waiting for me. I imagine her in heaven catching birds twice her size in tall trees she is no longer afraid to climb. I wonder if she is scampering in the forest with my boyfriend's dog Max, who just left us after 13 years. I envision Max easily doing magnificent flips and tricks that he could not do before because of a bad hip. They are both youthful and vibrant and once again full of life. I miss the animals and family I have lost, but I do my best to have faith and remember the story of the twins.

Our time in this world is short and we must treasure life and live it to the best of our ability. When I do finally depart one day, I want to have a lifetime of stories and adventures to share with my grandfathers.

"Will you carry the words of love with you. Will you ride the great white bird into heaven. And though you want to last forever, you know you never will… You're only dancing on this earth for a short while." – Cat Stevens

HONEY-GLAZED LEMON CHICKEN

2 7-lb. roasting chickens, rinsed, patted dry
2 1/2 cups fresh lemon juice
coarse kosher salt
freshly ground black pepper
1/2 cup honey, heated until pourable

Place each chicken in heavy-duty resealable plastic bag. Add 1 1/4 cups lemon juice to each. Seal bags; turn chickens to coat. Refrigerate at least 6 hours, turning bags occassionally.

Preheat oven to 450°F. Drain chickens; pat dry. Sprinkle each with salt and pepper. Place side by side, breast side down, on racks in large roasting pan. Roast 15 minutes. Reduce to 375°F for 45 minutes.

Turn chickens over. Brush with honey. Continue to roast until deep brown, brushing with juices occasionally, about 55 minutes.

Pour pan juices into small saucepan. Spoon off fat. Rewarm and season with salt and pepper.

Makes 8 servings.

God, a caterpillar and the High Holy Days

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

We live in a perfect world, full of imperfection.

What man could say that the metamorphosis of a wriggly caterpillar into a glamorous butterfly with the ability to fly is not the artwork of the Ideal? And who would be so brash as to state that the Flawless is void of treachery, suffering and cruelty?

URBAN WRITER

Our very existence, then, is a conundrum, a puzzle, seemingly and mysteriously dangled in front of us like salt water before a lost, floating and parched seaman. Good, bad; right, wrong; love, hate; volition, pre-destined. God, you confuse us. Why is the water not fresh and easily swallowed?

Tell me, are these not the thoughts of the woman sitting next to you on Rosh Hashanah, as she sings, oh so clearly, the words of Avinu Malkeinu? Or the considerations of the young man clupping his fist on his chest over and over, as he reads the Al Chait, the prayer of introspection and request?

Do we not intimately but collectively wonder in one prayer about God, the Sculptor, and we as His clay. Is He proud of us as his "image"? Will we perish by water or by the sword? Will the words of the prayer Hineni – "Let our omissions be forgiven in love, and in love cover all our transgressions" – be the wax with which God seals our fate in 5765?

Many Jews are now minimizing the mundane in their lives and beginning a demanding journey into a thorny but very lush orchard called the Days of Awe. Some of our people travel this road by looking inwardly to determine the level of growth and goodness in themselves and others. This is called tshuvah, literally "a return," a return to Godliness. Some define it as a sort of centring of our soul back to a point of perfection – a rebirth.

Other Jews will focus on prayer, now and during the holidays. They shake back and forth with the fervour of a willow tree in a windstorm, beseeching God to hear their pleas for life and adjust His gzar dinam – His mighty decree.

Then there are our Jewish brothers and sisters who appear to be disconnected from the holy traffic jams and the acidic rumblings of the fasting belly, yet are fully aware of the mightiness of these days, especially the Shabbat of Shabbatot. These Jews entrench themselves in tzedakah and/or tikkun olam (repairing the world), and fight on behalf of the suffering in Sudan, instead of praying.

Our new year is drawing near. I sense the temperature changing inside of me, as the court date with God gets closer. I can recall years past when the arms on the clock during these days appeared to move rapidly yet slowly. I remember the wonderment and the feeling in the air outside – starkly cool and harshly peaceful.

If you are in trepidation about the overwhelming mystery and holiness of Rosh Hashanah, know that so is the local Jewish fruit and vegetable vendor. If you wonder about your ability to fight to change God's decree through prayer, introspection and tzedakah, ask the mother strolling with her child along Clarke Avenue if she doesn't have the same fears.

Life is indeed confusing and imperfect and this reality is amplified in the days leading up to the High Holy Days. Yet, in a strangely perfect way, as we take our seats and the services begin, the imperfections somehow seem to transpose into a shadow, the perfection of the butterfly crystallizes and we survive the madness of the Flawed versus the Ideal.

These are the High Holy Days. Confusing. Imperfect, yet so tenderly perfect and beautiful.

MOUNT SINAI HOSPITAL | THE BEST MEDICINE

AN IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT TO OUR FAMILY

As you know, Mount Sinai Hospital never rests. In the coming weeks, we will introduce you to the next chapter in our Hospital's abiding commitment to The Best Medicine. Raising the bar once again, both in Canada and internationally, Mount Sinai is part of a world-wide team pursuing the future of medicine. With new technology, coupled with the findings of the Human Genome Project and the world-class research in our own Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute, we are now in the position to strive for a goal that was unimaginable only a few short years ago: Personalized Medicine.

Personalized Medicine is more than individualized compassionate care, though that's certainly an important part of it. Personalized Medicine is about understanding that every patient has their own biological, sociological, and psychological make-up. And it's about creating treatments that are unique for each of us. The end result is better prevention, earlier detection, and the curing of diseases. That's the future of medicine.

Our community and our donors have long understood the power of philanthropy to transform innovative ideas into healthier and happier lives for all of us. Remaining true to the heart and values of our heritage, your help in the past has made Mount Sinai one of the leading medical institutions on the continent.

As we move forward, we look once again to you, our community, for help in making the vision come to fruition. Help us further our quest to provide the best care, the best teaching, and the best research to each and every one.

Soul-stirring resonance

Editorial

Of the myriad visual images of Jewish moment from the year 5764, we have chosen the celebratory homecoming by Gal Fridman after he won the country's first-ever gold medal at the Olympic Games just three weeks ago, to encapsulate our reflections for Rosh Hashanah.

To be sure, there were many "weightier" news stories last year.

Terrorists extended the global reach and the indescribable horror of their murderous ways last year. There were fewer terror incidents in Israel last year, but not fewer terror attempts.

The decision by Israel's Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to unilaterally withdraw from the Gaza Strip has sidestepped the prevaricating schemes of the corrupt Palestinian Authority. But it has also set domestic Israeli politics roiling in a seething cauldron of boiling emotion.

The ruling by the International Court of Justice on Israel's security barrier once again cast Israel as the pariah among an enlightened fellowship of aggrieved neighbours.

Even Canadian cities were not immune to particularly ugly and dangerous incidents of anti-Semitism that proliferated last year.

There were, indeed, weightier, more compelling "Jewish" stories last year than young Fridman's gold medal in windsurfing, but rarely last year was the collective Jewish heart – in Israel and every Diaspora community – so deeply moved by a single event.

Rarely did the singing of Hatikvah evoke such soul-stirring resonance among Jews than the spontaneous, joyously, tearful rendition offered by the scattering of Fridman's supporters in Athens after the gold medal was placed around his neck.

The photograph on page 1 of the paper superbly conveys the overwhelming happiness of the airport greeters at seeing their champion return home. One of his jubilant fans carries Fridman high on his shoulders. The gladness of heart is spontaneous and pure and the affection that bursts forth untainted by politics, expedience or guile.

To our readers and advertisers — Shanah Tovah!

Rosh Hashanah Greetings

Become involved in the community

Ed Morgan,
National President,
Canadian Jewish Congress

In the movie Manhattan, Woody Allen's character, Ike, admonishes his friend, Yale, to think more critically about his own personal sense of ethics.

Yale, however, isn't quite up to the task. "You're so self-righteous!" he shouts at his friend. "We're just people. We're just human beings. You think you're God!"

Ike looks back sheepishly and replies, "I gotta model myself after someone."

We might think that this is just one more portrayal of the world's most narcissistic schlemiel. But it's also a very Jewish state of mind. What it illustrates, as Rabbi Jeffrey Salkin of the Hebrew Union College faculty points out in his book Being God's Partner, is that self-criticism is central to the biblical injunction "kedoshim tihyu ki kedoshim ani" ("Be holy because holy am I").

As we now know, Woody Allen himself could do with a dose of self-criticism. But, as I approach my first Rosh Hashanah as president of Canadian Jewish Congress, I am thinking about this in the context of an advocacy organization. The lesson is that it's easier to fight wrongs in society when we also fight them in ourselves.

A community that generously funds its Jewish day schools, even where only a minority of community members use them, will be far more effective in advocating that society at large fund minority religious schools. A community that eradicates all forms of discrimination – including homophobia – from itself (as encouraged by the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America), will be far more effective in advocating the eradication of all forms of discrimination – including anti-Semitism – from society at large. A community that treats its own labour force well will be far more effective in getting organized labour to treat it well.

The business community has in the past year been galvanized to make a positive contribution toward our funding, our operational efficiency and our clout. But we also need to re-commit to making our advocacy of social justice and community rights more credible.

This Rosh Hashanah, I urge all community members to get involved. As Woody has said, 80 per cent of life is showing up. Happy New Year.

Remain united as one

Dear Friends,

Rosh Hashanah, the Jewish New Year, unites all parts of the Jewish people throughout the world. During the High Holy Days, we conduct a personal, communal and national soul-searching.

The State of Israel faces difficult, even fateful, decisions. The issues involved in these decisions give rise to powerful emotions and deep disagreement.

In these days of fasting, prayer and charity, we need to remember what the Creator and Jewish history both demand of us – that we remain united as one. We can maintain unity, even while differing in opinion. Our goal is common, we differ on the way to reach it.

Regretfully, we are witness lately to a recurrence of anti-Semitism throughout Europe. Attacks against Jews and Jewish community institutions have increased, despite the efforts of European leaders. The State of Israel views these developments with deep concern. The Jewish people need to work against these developments together, from a sense of joint destiny. We need to work together with governments and proper authorities in order that these dark elements not be allowed to rise and harm universal human values. I congratulate the Jewish communities throughout the world on their expressions of solidarity with the people of Israel, and the many visitors who came to Israel this past year. I call on all of you to increase the number of visitors to Israel in the coming year. Your coming here strengthens the State of Israel and the mutual relations between us.

Moshe Katsav
President State of Israel

With the coming of the New Year, I call upon the Jewish people in Israel and the Diaspora to show unity, tolerance and ahavat Yisrael, love of Israel.

On behalf of my wife Gila and myself, and on behalf of the citizens of Israel, I send you and your families our best wishes for a Happy New Year, for a year of peace and security in our region and a year of peace and tranquility for all mankind.

A Happy and Joyous New Year

PETA 'Holocaust' campaign denounced

Display permit refused for Toronto showing

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — City and provincial officials in Toronto last week refused to allow a U.S.-based animal rights group to open a photo exhibit with images of Holocaust victims that was earlier shown for the first time in Canada in Montreal's downtown Phillips Square.

Because the "Holocaust on Your Plate" exhibition organized by the People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals (PETA) uses photographic images from the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in violation of the museum's Photograph Use Agreement, Canadian Jewish Congress was able to persuade city and provincial officials to refuse PETA permission to display the photographs.

"Both the City of Toronto and Queen's Park felt that the display violates community norms reasonably expected by the public," said Bernie Farber, executive director of CJC's Ontario region.

Farber said city officials rejected PETA's request to set up a display in a public square at Yonge and Dundas. Later, when PETA attempted to present the same display on the grounds of Queen's Park, the facility's operations manager told PETA they could not show the Holocaust images. PETA refused to run the exhibit without the images and removed the entire display, Farber said.

Congress and B'nai Brith Canada denounced the group's shocking visual display that juxtaposes death camp photos with those of abused livestock. It made its first Canadian appearance in Montreal last Friday.

The exhibition by PETA, based in Norfolk, Va., was launched about 1½ years ago in San Francisco. It has since toured about 100 cities in the United States and Europe, including Poland, although it was prohibited in Germany and Britain.

It is also posted on a PETA website.

The group says it's a protest against "factory farming" and promotes vegetarianism.

The two-hour lunchtime exhibit in Montreal was criticized by Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec Region, president Jeffrey Boro as "vile" and "insensitive" because it "trivializes the pain and suffering" of the Nazis' Jewish victims and because the Holocaust "cannot be compared to anything before or since." However, he did not believe it crossed any legal lines in Canada.

"Personally, I think that freedom of speech, as long as it does not promote hate or violence against any group, is permissible in our society," said Boro, a lawyer.

B'nai Brith Canada called the display "deeply offensive" and "an insult" to the memory of the six million Jews who perished.

"The skewed comparison depicting the suffering of animals with the horrific torment that the victims of the Holocaust forcibly underwent is a grotesque misrepresentation of one of the most tragic historic events known to mankind," B'nai Brith's national president Harold Davis said in a statement.

"PETA's ill-conceived campaign not only trivializes the Holocaust, but it displays a callous and inappropriate disregard for its victims. In this day and age when anti-Semitism continues its global rise, it is unconscionable and, in fact, dangerous to display so blatant a lack of understanding for what was the Holocaust."

Neither organization was aware the display was coming to Canada until informed by The CJN the day before it arrived in Montreal last Wednesday.

The exhibition, which consists of eight 5.6-square metre panels, was shown in Ottawa's Byward Market on Thursday and was to be shown the next day outside Queen's Park in Toronto.

Among the images is a picture of starved nude male inmates beside one of an emaciated cow. Another titled "The Final Indignity" pairs a photo of piles of human bodies with one of a heap of dead pigs.

The last panel reads: "During the seven years between 1938-45, 12 million people

In every person, something precious

From the editor's desk

The Juvenile Court in the turbulent, late 1970's at 311 Jarvis St. in downtown Toronto was a strange, even unsettling place for a novice lawyer from the bungalowed suburbs clumsily representing his first legal aid client.

I mumbled when I should have been assertive. I fumbled for my place in the text when I should have had the page at my fingertips. I was nervous when I should have been at ease.

The sight of my distress was too much for one of the lawyers patiently waiting his turn at the back of the room. He took pity on me and with an undetected sleight of hand, passed me a note that pinpointed the legal argument that was eluding me. I did not get a good look at my benefactor but I did notice he wore a brown tweed jacket with a matching brown sweater vest. When my ordeal-by-trial was over, I thanked the knightly man for the rescue that calmed both my and my client's nerves. I bought him a cup of coffee, which he sipped for more than an hour through pleasant conversation and amusing tales of legal miscues and lawyerly faux pas.

That is how I met Jerry and how we became friends nearly three decades ago.

He was barely older than I, but sufficiently more experienced and wiser to become a mentor in my early years as an advocate in the roughhouse courtrooms and corridors of the family, juvenile and criminal divisions of the Ontario Provincial Court.

Professorial in his bearing, careful with his words, precise in his reasoning and widely eclectic in his reading, Jerry resembled and acted like an English barrister, even in those early days when he was quite young himself. Being an advocate was his natural calling more than it was his vocation.

Jerry loved sports as much as he loved advocacy. Not that he could play any, though. He simply wasn't built that way; he was slight and small. Rather, Jerry was built to watch, especially from the comfort of a living room chair that was easy on his tired back, with a bag of chips and a beer, or other refreshment, close at hand.

Over the years we watched a great deal of sports together. Each Wednesday evening, Jerry would come to our home, usually after dinner, sometimes for dinner, but always in time to watch – if not enjoy – the hockey or baseball game on television that night.

During the long, happy course of those many Wednesday nights, he also became the avuncular, bachelor friend to the four curly-headed, young girls growing up in our home. His visits were part of the family's weekly routine. And he was always with us at our family's milestone celebrations.

We were good friends.

But even good friends sometimes drift apart. No one is to blame, we say to ourselves. It simply happens, like a crack in the plaster of a wall. Personal schedules no longer coincide. Family situations evolve. New social patterns emerge. The affection is undiminished, we assure ourselves, but contact is less.

After I changed jobs some 10 years ago, Jerry and I began to drift apart. We spoke on the phone but hardly saw each other. He no longer came to the house on Wednesday. Inevitably, our phone calls became sporadic. Eventually, they virtually stopped.

Then, two years ago, he called me from the hospital. I rushed to be with him. I visited each night for almost a week. A variation of a problem that had plagued him some years ago flared up again. But the treatment this time wasn't going as smoothly.

After Jerry left the hospital, I determined to stay in close contact. Though he did not feel well enough to come to the house as he used to, we spoke often, that is, for a while, until the habits that had formed more recently re-emerged. The phone calls once again became less frequent and then, after a time, stopped altogether. It's been more than two years since we spoke.

Last week, Jerry's cousin called. "Jerry died," I heard him say. Weakened and beset by ailment, his cousin said, Jerry had become reclusive and so unhappy that he ended his own life.

Shocked, disbelieving and numb, I fell silent at the news. I could not respond. I did not know what to say. Sadness overwhelmed me.

Jerry was my friend, yet how could I call myself a "friend?" Friendship is responsibility; it's caring; it's doing. It's the feeling you give to others that they are not alone. How could I still call myself Jerry's friend? Had we not fallen out of touch, could I have possibly diverted him from his awful plan? I was overcome with feelings of shame and guilt and remorse.

In university so many years ago, I read and believed that "no man is useless while he has a friend." I still believe it. But calling oneself a friend means being a friend.

Our sages teach us that "in every person there is something precious which is in no one else." My inattention to Jerry did nothing to help him see the preciousness his suffering and debility had obscured.

When the shofar sounds this week and when I bring the al cheyts (the sins of commission and of omission) to my heart, I will direct my thoughts to Jerry, who was once my friend. And I will resolve to do all I can so that no one whom I call friend will ever again feel alone, or "useless."

"In every person there is something precious." God made us that way.

May Jerry's memory be for blessing.

B'nai Brith supports Islamic religious courts

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

B'nai Brith Canada has endorsed private arbitration panels that would use sharia, or Islamic religious law, to settle civil disputes between Muslims, as long as certain safeguards are enacted.

B'nai Brith's support for the contentious tribunals came on the same day as protesters across the country and in front of Canadian legations overseas voiced strident opposition to the bodies. At a Queen's Park rally last Wednesday, members of the International Campaign Against Sharia Courts in Canada, most of them Muslims, denounced the proposed tribunals as hurtful to women and new immigrants, and inimical to Canadian law and values.

In a report submitted to Marion Boyd, a former attorney general appointed by Premier Dalton McGuinty to examine the role of private arbitration and religious courts in Ontario, John Syrtash, a Toronto family lawyer acting on behalf of B'nai Brith, endorsed the sharia tribunals, but recommended additional safeguards be put in place.

"Multicultural guarantees under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms include the right of all faith-based or religious groups to operate their own arbitration courts in family law matters – as long as participants do so voluntarily and with due process and fairness," said B'nai Brith Canada national president Harold Davis in a statement.

"Jewish religious courts have worked well in Canada. If we are truly to be an open and pluralistic society in Canada, then the different religious practices making up Canada's mosaic must be accommodated," Davis said.

Syrtash said B'nai Brith has tried to quell the heated debate surrounding the sharia tribunals. "Sharia-based courts will not bring the Taliban to Canada," he stated.

In his submission, Syrtash argued that Ontario's 1991 Arbitration Act, which sanctions private, binding arbitration, including religious courts, should not be altered to affect the rights of Jews "or members of other religious groups under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms," except to ensure that litigants appearing before these tribunals do so voluntarily.

B'nai Brith "supports the integrity of freedom of choice" when it comes to religion, but reserves "deep concerns" that women and members of other vulnerable groups "may be culturally obliged" to participate in religious legal proceedings against their will.

Muslim women's groups and other organizations opposing the sharia tribunals have argued that women, especially new immigrants, would be coerced into taking their grievances to a sharia panel or face ostracism from their communities, as well as having to submit to rulings that would overwhelmingly favour men in matters of divorce, inheritance, child custody and other aspects of family law.

Syrtash pointed out that Jewish courts of law, or batei din, have been successfully operating in family law for hundreds of years and "serve as a model of success," especially in Ontario.

B'nai Brith said existing safeguards built into the Arbitration Act are sound. Secular courts, for example, will not tolerate duress regarding participation, nor would they abide rulings that are contrary to Canadian laws or human rights codes.

In fact, on one occasion, an Ontario court intervened with a beit din because the rabbis on the panel had overly delayed a matrimonial dispute involving child support. Syrtash said this was the only known case in which a beit din was overruled, "clearly suggesting that the system usually functions well.

"We believe that the courts will continue to protect the rights of the litigants in the event of any fundamental injustice, especially if any litigant attempts to enforce a religious court order that was obtained unfairly, or where the result clearly interferes with a child's best interests," the B'nai Brith brief states.

Syrtash recommended that Boyd consider added safeguards.

One would see the Arbitration Act amended to require that all litigants first obtain a certificate of independent legal advice from a lawyer. The document would attest that the parties had forgone the option of going to a secular court and were fully apprised of the nature of alternative, including religious, legal systems.

Syrtash also suggests these certificates be reviewed by a judge before a religious court's decision could be enforced.

As well, lawyers should be obliged to inform clients of the benefits of going to a secular court. "As a result, many will stay in the Ontario court system," the brief states.

Three rabbis from each of Judaism's major streams and two representatives of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) met with Boyd for 90 minutes on Aug. 25 to brief her on how a beit din works.

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, secretary of the beit din of the Vaad Harabanim, Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum and Rabbi Edward Elkin joined CJC's Simon Rosenblum and Ontario region chair Joel Richler in the meeting with Boyd.

Rosenblum stressed CJC is not taking a position for or against the sharia courts. He said the purpose of the meeting was to explain the workings of a beit din and respond to her questions.

"She was quite impressed that nothing is going on [in the beit din] that is irregular or that it acts in a fashion in which women are treated as second-class citizens," Rosenblum said.

He said Boyd was aware that a beit din resolves civil and commercial disputes, but also grants gets (Jewish divorce decrees) and oversees the final steps of conversion to Judaism.

As for the sharia panels, "we recognize there's a new player on the block. Only time will tell whether they will [follow] proceedings under Ontario law."

Boyd's report to the government is due Sept. 30.

Rabbi Treister returns to his roots as new rabbi at Congregation Habonim

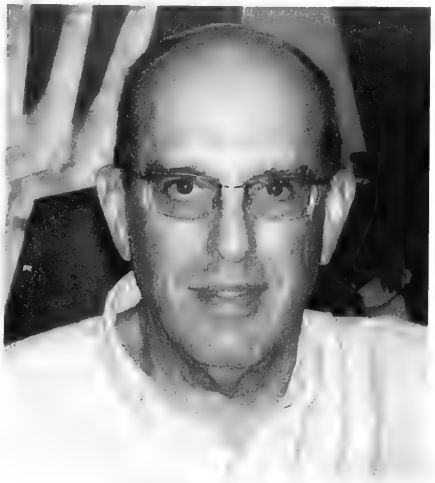
By FRANCES KRAFT
- Staff Reporter

Rabbi Edward Treister has returned to his roots. After more than 30 years, he is back in his hometown of Toronto, and after 11 years in the field of education – most recently in Israel he has once again taken on a pulpit position.

The new spiritual leader of Congregation Habonim – a 350-family liberal egalitarian congregation founded almost 50 years ago – was ordained by the Reform movement's Hebrew Union College (HUC) in Cincinnati after completing an undergraduate degree at the University of Toronto.

Following his first pulpit at Temple Rodeph Shalom in Montreal, Rabbi Treister led two congregations (consecutively) in Houston, where he also earned his doctorate in education.

"I'm very pleased to be here," said the rabbi, whose wife Rochelle, a systems analyst, is also a Torontonian. In terms of a Jewish community, he asserts with a smile, Toronto is the "second-best place" – after Israel.



Rabbi Edward Treister

It's where he had his bar mitzvah – at the Apter Centre – and where he became involved with Canadian Young Judaea, United Synagogue Youth and Hillel.

With more than 25 years of pulpit experience, Rabbi Treister missed being involved in congregants' lives.

"One of my great pleasures is to serve as a guide at both sad and joyous events, to take them through those events of change… and know that I've had an impact," he said in an interview at the synagogue last week.

In different ways, he also feels he's made an impact in recent years teaching English in Israel, where he has lived since 1996.

The position at Habonim was offered to Rabbi Treister shortly after he arrived in Toronto in mid-August on an extended leave from his high school position in Israel. He takes over from Eli Rubenstein, who has led the congregation for 17 years and is currently on medical leave.

"I think he's an excellent choice," said Rubenstein, who plans to remain involved with the congregation.

Rubenstein has done "yeoman's work," the rabbi said. "People have nothing but the highest praise for Eli."

Rabbi Treister didn't set out to serve congregations, but rather to pursue knowledge. When he entered HUC, "there weren't a lot of places for people with a liberal orientation to study Judaica," he said. But toward the end of the program, working in a small community, he saw "the impact a rabbi could have on people's lives and people's Jewish lives."

Rabbi Treister describes himself as being at the traditional end of the Reform spectrum, and said he is pleased that Habonim is unaffiliated. "It gives them the freedom to find their own way, to lean a little to the left, or a little to the right. It opens up lots of creative possibilities."

His first priority, he said, is to get to know the congregants. Rosh Hashanah will mark his first service at the synagogue.

The rabbi also wants to work on expanding religious services – which are now held regularly on Shabbat morning, and once a month on Friday night – and educational programming. "I want people to feel comfortable and competent with their Jewishness."

His own comfort level involves a degree of informality. At Houston's now-defunct Congregation Shaarei Tsedek, where he served from 1986 to 1993, he instituted a half-hour coffee break in the middle of services that included a discussion about the Torah portion to follow. "I want [congregants] to know I'm approachable."

A NEW YEAR
A NEW BEGINNING.

Rosh Hashanah is traditionally a time to look back at the year just past. It is also a time of looking forward to a New Year...a new beginning.
May this New Year be one of peace. Peace of mind; peace of spirit. And may it bring peace to our homeland, and a new beginning for its people.

Exhibit preserves memory of Polish Jewish culture

By ADAM FUERSTENBERG
Special to The CJN

"And I Still See Their Faces", an exhibit of photographs of Polish Jewry prior to the community's near-total annihilation during the Holocaust is on display until Sept. 15 at Toronto's BCE Place.

The 456 photographs showed Polish Jews in all walks of life, from the poorest in impoverished shtetls to the well-to-do in sophisticated Lodz and Warsaw, and from shy little children in nurseries to people in seniors homes.

There were photos of yeshiva students and rabbis in traditional garb and of almost totally assimilated officers who served in the Polish army and navy after 1919 or in the armed forces of the three countries – Germany, the Austro-Hungarian Empire and Czarist Russia – that occupied Poland for almost 150 years before World War I.

Bankers, industrialists, tinkers, tailors, farmers, university professors and merchants were shown living normal lives in hundreds of communities, enjoying moments of leisure at a beach or working intensely in shops and factories.

Since its first showing in Warsaw in 1995, the exhibit has been to more than 20 cities, including Boston, Hamburg, Chicago, Mexico City, Prague, Paris and Buenos Aires.

In each city, people have recognized relatives or friends in the photos. Often, it's the only picture of the individual that has survived.

In Toronto, Sidney Lipsey recognized his little sister in a class picture in Drobnin, while the poet Simcha Simocovitch saw himself again as an adolescent in Otwock. Rabbi Dow Marmur, rabbi emeritus at Holy Blossom Temple, found a picture of his father-in-law, Isaac Zonabend, as a young yeshiva student.

The chosen photographs were among more than 8,000 sent in by Poles when Golda Tenzer, a popular singer and actress in the Warsaw Yiddish Theatre, broadcast an appeal to her fellow citizens to send her pictures they had of any pre-war Jewish friends and relatives.

She wanted, she stressed, to preserve the memory of the people and the culture that had been so brutally destroyed. Speaking in Yiddish at the opening reception in Toronto, she explained, "I wanted these people to be remembered not as the emaciated, half-dead victims of the death camps, but as the lively, vibrant humans that they were".

Indeed, the photos showed Jewish life in all its complexity and diversity, as one would expect from a community of 3½ million people whose culture dated back 1,000 years.

At the opening, Toronto Mayor David Miller lauded the Canadian Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation and the many corporate and individual sponsors for bringing the photo exhibit to the city.

He paid tribute to the Shalom Foundation of Poland for creating "this poignant and moving reminder of a once vibrant culture" that was destroyed by racism and hatred.

Soul-stirring resonance

In a gesture of far-reaching significance, after he arrived home, Fridman visited the monument in Tel Aviv that memorializes the 11 athletes and coaches slain by the PLO terrorists in 1972.

His victory in the wind and surf was not merely an athletic achievement, Fridman seemed to imply, but a further forging of a link of memory, connectedness and gratitude on the long, metaphysical chain of peoplehood and history.

The distillate, the essence of that spontaneous gladness that is so sweetly evident in the embrace of Gal Fridman when he brought the medal home is the feeling we must try to grasp at this time of year.

Despite the nagging, dreaded similarity to aspects of times past we all know to be true concerning the modern Jewish condition, this time of year is one of celebration and great gratitude for us.

Jewish life has vast possibilities for personal and societal betterment. It is alive and present. If we only choose to, we can make it exciting, creative, fulfilling and relevant.

There are vicious, fanatic enemies arrayed against the West and especially against the ancient-yet-modern avatars of western values, namely, us, the Jews. But we dare not retreat from being who we are. We dare not fall away from our historic, common purpose.

As we enter the new year through the corridor of the Yamim Nora'im (the days of awe and reflection) let us try to feel the connectedness and gratitude so evident in Gal Fridman's homecoming.

In every generation, enemies have been arrayed against the Jewish people. In the 12th century, the Jews of Yemen suffered violence and persecutions and were threatened with expulsion if they did not renounce their faith and convert to Islam. A representative of the community sought advice from the great teacher of that time, Moses ben Maimon, who lived then in Egypt.

The following is an excerpt of Maimonides' counsel to his troubled fellow Jews:

"Brethren, be strong and of good courage…

"It is your duty, brethren of Israel, who are scattered over the whole earth, to strengthen one another. The older should encourage the younger, and the prominent men, the multitude. The nation should be united in the name of truth, which does not change. Raise your voice in strong faith… Keep ever in mind the event on Mount Sinai.

"Understand my brethren the meaning of that covenant: the nation as a whole witnessed the word of God and His presence. This event should strengthen our faith and enable us to resist the strain of persecutions and intolerance in times like these."

Maimonides could have written his letter to us as well.

Let us therefore be strong and of good courage as we enter the new year, but grateful and happy too that God has sustained us and brought us to this day.

Shanah Tovah.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO…

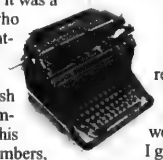
MIAs: Ron Arad, Zachary Baumel, Tzvi Feldman and Yehuda Katz.

Challenges Rabbi Marmur

In a time of anti-Jewish acts around the world, Rabbi Dow Marmur found it appropriate to open a new front against Jews who he says are "on the margin of Jewish life" ("Don't blame Israel for anti-Semitism," CJN, Sept. 2), attacking them for being "preoccupied with anti-Semitism." In contrast, "religious groups rarely put anti-Semitism at the top of their agendas… Faith and lifestyles, not enemies, determine their Jewish identity," he writes.

Does Rabbi Marmur not realize that he is sending the wrong message to the governments, to rarely put anti-Semitism at the top of their agendas, even though anti-Semitic acts are being committed and Jews and Jewish institutions are being attacked?

Concerning the rabbi's accusation that assimilated Jews are ambiguous toward Israel, may I remind him that it was a so-called "assimilated" Jew, Theodor Herzl, who founded the modern Zionist movement and countless "assimilated" Jews who fought and died in Israel's War of Independence.



It has become a habit practised by some Jewish religious leaders to call non-practising Jews "assimilated" and being "on the margin of Jewish life." This is an insult to the memory of the Bund party members, who were at the forefront of keeping Jewish culture alive, and to the members of the Zionist parties as personified by Mordecai Anielewicz, leader of the Warsaw Ghetto revolt, who fought for the establishment of the Jewish national aspiration and the restoration of Jewish honour.

Nation of liberators or oppressors?

With the third anniversary of 9/11, a major shift in world opinion has occurred. The foremost issue of concern on many people's minds comes in the form of a question: Is the United States a nation of liberators or oppressors?

President George W. Bush's foreign policy decisions in Iraq and throughout the Middle East are in disfavour. In the U.S., the left has entrenched itself, causing a great deal of fury and debate that has not been seen since mass demonstration were held to protest the Vietnam War in the 1960s.

In our country, many of those who lined up to see Michael Moore's documentary movie, Fahrenheit 9/11, have espoused the director's view and have made "Bush bashing" fashionable. Members of Parliament and former government officials also have jumped into the fray and have called Americans, and those they elect to office, bastards, idiots and morons. Why has this unbecoming attitude captured Canadians' political views? Simply because they disagree with the Bush administration and his world views.

Those who question the hegemonic power of the U.S. do not realize that its interventions abroad in the past were short-lived. The U.S. has no intention of becoming a nation of colonizers. Its intentions in Iraq have been trivialized unfairly, with many calling Bush's motives in Iraq simply pure greed.

The U.S. aim of bringing democratic rule to Iraq and Afghanistan and reform to the Arab world has also been questioned by Bush's critics. But in the UN Development Program's Arab Human Development Reports of 2002 and 2003, Arab intellectuals called for democratic reform in 19 Arab countries. Impassioned pleas for democracy by intellectuals and those working in NGOs in the Arab world have been silenced and disregarded by a majority of rogue regimes, who defy their calls for democratic reform. Bush's critics seemingly forget that America is the liberator of Iraqis and Afghans from their former oppressive rulers, the Baathist party and the Taliban.

If Bush does win the upcoming presidential election this November, let's hope that his critics in Canada and abroad will end the name-calling and instead praise him for liberating the people who have yearned for a free and democratic way of life.

Looking for a music book

The recent article concerning the Baron Byng 65th reunion of the graduating class ("Baron Byng class reunites on 65th anniversary," CJN, Jufy 15) brought back many nostalgic memories, especially the songs we all remember.

I graduated in June 1935, and music was an especially important ingredient of my high school education. I was very attached to the Novello Book of Songs of the World, but my copy has been misplaced.

If anyone has this book, I would greatly appreciate being contacted.

Worldwide terrorism

The ogre's tentacles of death are being witnessed globally every day: a Russian school seized in Beslan and the result is a blood bath; 16 killed and hundreds injured in a bus bombing in Israel; Iran supplying Hezbollah with thousands of missiles and building a uranium enrichment plant; the slaying of 12 Nepalese hostages in Iraq; genocide in Darfur by armed Sudanese militants; foreign insurgents attack government strongholds in Afghanistan; and trains are bombed in Spain. The list goes on and on.

Russian President Vladimir Putin linked the Beslan attack to the worldwide network of terrorism. Abdulraham al Rashed, general manager of the Al-Arabiya TV network, wrote, "Our terrorist sons are an end product of our corrupted culture." Egypt's highest ranking cleric cried out, "You are taking Islam as a cover, and it is a deceptive cover."

Putin has joined the ranks of President George W. Bush and Prime Minister Ariel Sharon as he pledged to fight terrorism globally, wherever it rears its vicious head. Nip it in the bud, Bush-style, or cut and run to appease the terrorists as Spain and the Philippines have done? Will John Kerry be another Neville Chamberlain (British prime minister from 1937 to '40) and allow the terrorists to push western democracy into submission?

International Court of Justice 'doing us an injustice'

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Last week, Alan Baker arrived in Ottawa to assume his post as Israel's ambassador to Canada. Over the past eight years, as the legal adviser to the Foreign Ministry, Baker has logged thousands of hours of negotiations with Egyptians, Palestinians, Jordanians, and Lebanese. He has had meetings with political leaders on the left and the right and appeared often in international forums to protect Israel from Palestinian claims of human rights infractions.

On the eve of his departure for Canada, Ha'aretz interviewed him in his Jerusalem office

From the perspective of 2004, what is the lesson you learned from negotiations with the Palestinians?

"We were naive when we conducted negotiations during the period of [former prime minister Yitzhak] Rabin and [former foreign minister Shimon] Peres. There was nothing in the interim agreement [Oslo B, which defined the relationship between Israel and the Palestinian Authority] that related to what would happen if the whole business fell apart. We depended so heavily on the exchange of letters between Yitzhak Rabin and [then PLO leader] Yasser Arafat stating we were finished with violence that we didn't put any assurances into the agreements involving the Americans or the Europeans, or, between the two sides, except for the military committee and such. There was nothing about the complete crumbling of the PA, or its takeover by hostile and violent elements. And we have been suffering because of this for years."

Did you try to put a clause like that into the agreement?

"I remember a meeting in 1995 with Uzi Dayan, Gilad Sher and Jibril Rajoub in which we proposed a clause allowing the Israelis to go into the territories. Rajoub said, in good Hebrew, with a smile on his face, "I won't be able to sell that to Arafat, and you'll do it anyway."

According to Baker, the interim agreement stated that both sides would do what was necessary to prevent terror, and "we base our presence in the territories today on this vague legal formulation. We must act, because the Palestinians are not preventing terror."

Were you properly prepared for negotiation?

"We prepared very well. We co-ordinated with the defence establishment, we did background work and planned everything. The problem is always that those conducting the negotiations tend not to remain within the red lines that we, the civil servants, dictate. I'll never forget the time when Shlomo Ben-Ami was foreign minister and we told him at one point that he was ready to give up more than we had proposed. He responded that as a historian sometimes one reaches a historic juncture from which one must move ahead. It's a problem of the professional negotiators, the civil servants. They can do the background work, but the ones negotiating – Peres, Ben-Ami, Bibi [former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu] – compromise, and we find ourselves left with formulations that we have to find ways to correct after the fact."

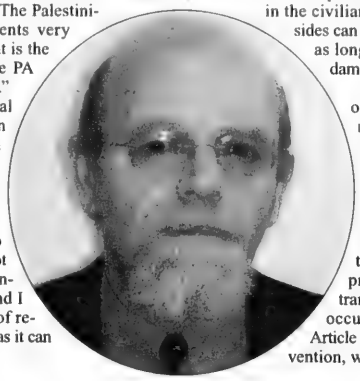
Are the Oslo accords still in force?

"Yes, and that is very important, in spite of all the breaches on both sides. We are also not without fault. But we and the Palestinians both have been careful not to declare them null and void. If they are annulled, there will be a vacuum, and I have always been afraid of a vacuum into which the United Nations will step. The Palestinians need agreements very much, because that is the legal basis for the PA and Arafat's status."

Is the unilateral disengagement plan in accordance with Oslo?

"Certainly. The agreements include Israeli obligations to redeploy that do not depend on Palestinian agreement. And I see this as a kind of redeployment, as far as it can be implemented.

"I am disappointed and frustrated. I expected a much more encouraging game from the Egyptians. I sat with them on 50 negotiating committees on every possible subject, and the economic and tourism potential has been lost. We have been without an Egyptian ambassador for four years. I'm disappointed in the Jordanians as well. They conducted very intimate negotiations over the peace treaty and the transportation agreements. They are very nice people, but the agreements include an obligation for a resident ambassador. Where is he? I recommended that the issue of ambassadors be paramount in our talks with Jordan and with Egypt. But I am only the legal counsel. There is a political complex. I only give advice."



Israel's new ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker

Baker admits to being "frustrated and disappointed" with the results of the peace process with the Palestinians as well. "It's part of the naivete I mentioned. We really did believe. When we finished the negotiations over the interim agreement on the eve of Rosh Hashanah nine years ago, we were overjoyed that we had gotten out of the dirt and were on the high road."

Nevertheless, Baker believes even now that the interim agreement is a good one, and says, "It's a shame that we could not hold on to it." The Hebron and Wye agreements signed during Netanyahu's tenure, and the Sharm el-Sheikh agreement from the beginning of Ehud Barak's term as prime minister, strengthened and clarified things that were important to both sides.

"They can still be fulfilled if there is a will," Baker says.

What about Israel's violations?

"The Palestinians always claimed that we never put the safe passage into operation [from Gaza to the West Bank]."

And what about the settlements?

"The Palestinians asked for a clause on freezing settlements during the negotiations, as Menachem Begin had promised during his talks with the Egyptians. We started to negotiate with them on an accompanying letter that would clarify Israel's settlement policy and its limitations. After five or six formulations, Arafat came and said he preferred there not be anything, otherwise he would be blamed. In the interim agreement, there's just the clause about planning and construction in the civilian appendix, that both sides can build in their territory as long as it does not cause damage."

But don't the UN resolutions and The Hague ruling determine that settlements are illegal and contravene the Geneva Convention?

"We have a dispute with the international community. We argue that the prohibition on the transfer of population to occupied territory, in Article 94 of the Geneva Convention, was formulated during World War II to prevent the massive forced transfer of population in Poland, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia. We aren't doing this. The settlement policy is voluntary. All settlers, myself included [Baker lives in Har Adar northwest of Jerusalem] sign an agreement with the Israel Lands Administration that they know the time may come when a political settlement will change the status of the territory. My house is not registered as mine in the Land Registry. I have only a leasing agreement with the administration. We therefore argue that the settlements do not contravene Article 94. But no one else buys this."

According to Baker, the Palestinians prefer to emphasize the settlements as the spearhead of their political struggle against Israel, because it is more convenient for them than raising demands about Jerusalem, which may anger the Christian world, or about the Palestinian refugees' right of return, which Baker says does not exist at all in terms of international law.

And how do you explain the success of the Palestinian struggle over the separation fence?

"It's a sexy subject, which provides a soap box for all the Palestinian claims: it involves annexation, as they claim, of territory; of 'apartheid,' as they say it creates limited enclaves; and serious infraction of human rights in the prevention of freedom of movement. All the components of every injustice. My surprise and disappointment were in the fact that the international community was unwilling to see the fence as part of the struggle against terror. They look at it as if the Israelis just up and decided one day to make trouble for the Palestinians and to build a wall, just to make things hard for them."

The International Court of Justice ruling, which states that Israel's actions in the territories are illegal and the wall should be taken down, infuriate Baker. "They are doing us an injustice. The problem is that it's impossible to separate between politics and the hearing. We saw in The Hague that people came to the court with a clear political agenda, with the UN political resolution, and clear political motives that the Palestinians didn't hide, to detour negotiations with a court ruling. That does not mean that our positions were not right."

Baker has no doubt that the construction of the fence is justified under international law, which allows an occupier to construct defences. He is convinced that he was right in his advice to the government not to send Israeli representatives to appear before the court. He utterly rejects the report by a team of jurists appointed by Attorney General Menachem Mazuz who examined the implications of the court's ruling. According to Baker, the report engenders unnecessary panic. "The Justice Ministry recommendation that we try to mollify the international community, will not be taken in the right way. It will be understood as if we were not right, and I am convinced that we are."

Aren't you concerned about sanctions against Israel as a result of the international court's ruling?

"No, and on this I disagree with the Justice Ministry. I don't believe that the Europeans and most countries want to take a 'violent' step against Israel. So I also object to the evaluation of the Justice Ministry that every senior Israeli travelling abroad will have to stand trial."

Do reports of human rights infractions against Palestinians bother you?

"It's not right, and it can be dealt with. I saw this first-hand. My son served at the Qalqilyah checkpoint. We would go there to bring him food, and I would sit with him at the checkpoint and see what was happening. It is terribly difficult for soldiers to deal with the challenges there. With impatient people, with groups of international students who come to provoke them, to denounce them, yell at them and curse them. Manning the checkpoints is very difficult and requires a great deal of skill and patience. Clearly, we must behave in non-violent and tolerant ways. The problem is that the Palestinians take advantage of our Western democratic morals to undermine this."

Baker follows the Palestinian effort to give international recognition to the Green Line and is trying to fight against it. "As a jurist, I say that this has no legal basis. The ceasefire agreements state that the line is temporary and is not to impair any political border to be determined by the two sides. Therefore the Green Line is not considered a border, but rather in practical terms has become a separation line between sovereign Israeli territory and territory that is still in negotiation or dispute. My legal advice to prime ministers and foreign ministers was to approach the Americans and the Europeans and note that the Green Line is not a border."

IOC stance on massacre may be changing

On Sept. 5, 1972, terrorists belonging to the PLO faction Black September scaled the fence around Munich's Olympic Village and stormed the complex that housed the Israeli team.

Wrestling coach Moshe Weinberg and weightlifter Yossi Romano were fatally shot as they tried to fend off the attackers, but their selfless acts of heroism gave other members of their contingent an opportunity to escape. Sadly, nine athletes and coaches were unable to get themselves out of harm's way. Taken hostage, they were later transferred by helicopter to the nearby Fuerstenfeldbruck air base where, in accordance with the fedayeens' demands, an airplane was commissioned to take them to Cairo. What ensued was a botched rescue attempt by German sharpshooters that ended with the deaths of all the hostages and five of the eight terrorists.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

The gratuitous murder of Israeli athletes was not seen as reason enough to cancel or postpone those fateful Games. Moreover, in their official report following the Olympics, the German organizers all but ignored the terrorist atrocity. Instead, they highlighted the "informality" of the Olympic Village, commenting on its "contribution to the relaxed spirit of the Games." And, as if to add further insult to injury, not only to the families of the slain athletes but also to all of Am Israel, the International Olympic Committee has remained astonishingly reticent about properly recognizing the victims of the massacre.

The reasons for the official IOC position have never been clearly articulated, but it's likely more than just a vague assumption that fears of offending Israel's enemies in the Arab-Muslim world have played a significant role.

However, recent signals from the hierarchy of the Olympic movement may be paving the way for change. In 2002, for example, IOC president Jacques Rogge joined about 100 political leaders and sports figures at Fuerstenfeldbruck to mark the 30th anniversary of the Munich killings. In addressing the gathering, he gave his assurance that "the IOC will keep the memory of these victims alive."

And whereas the IOC had declined invitations to attend private memorial services for the slain athletes at both the 1996 Atlanta Games and the Sydney Olympics in 2000, Rogge did show up for a similar observance in Athens last month. This was the first time a sitting IOC president had gone to such an event. Even more surprising was the presence of his predecessor, Juan Antonio Samaranch, who had never before attended one of the memorials.

It now remains to be seen whether the current IOC leaders will move towards publicly acknowledging the Munich tragedy at future Games. Though their obligation to do so seems obvious, and is deplorably long overdue, almost any shift in this direction would be viewed as significant.

A fairy tale for the new year

I am writing these lines one day after the horrific suicide attack in Be'er Sheva. And yet with the new year just around the corner, I prefer, out of a sense of desperation perhaps, to draw attention to another, rather odd event that occurred at the Caffit restaurant in Jerusalem a few short weeks ago.

Ross Culiner in Jerusalem

The Israeli capital has been enjoying relative calm since February. That's not to say that the psychological scars and paranoid fears are not here to stay. Even now, I find myself, as do so many other Jerusalemites, looking over my shoulder, anticipating the imminent fall of the axe. Moreover, following the total collapse of the "peace process," I have finally internalized a fundamental axiom of Jewish life, namely that just when things look OK, like they may be getting better, you can bet they're bad and getting worse.

So when I heard that a Palestinian, Malik Nasser A-Din, 41, had attempted a suicide bombing at the fashionable sidewalk café, I couldn't say that I was surprised. The outcome, however, confounded me. For after making his way into town through one of the last remaining gaps in the new security barrier, and after being driven to his objective by a local collaborator, the killer suddenly changed his mind. At the critical moment, his prospective victims blithely sipping their coffees and milkshakes before his eyes, his loaded revolver ready and poised to shoot the guard at the door, his finger edging nearer the trigger of his explosive belt, Nasser A-Din hesitated, turned and fled.

Knowing as much as we do about the man, his change of heart could scarcely be attributed to fear or lack of motivation. Of motivation, there was plenty, the product of long years of violent confrontations with Israeli soldiers, a strong Islamic orientation, a lengthy stint in Israeli jails and an expulsion to Lebanon in 1992. Skill, desire and courage were all there in sufficient measure.

So what happened? We will never know for sure, since a few days later, informants disclosed the fugitive's whereabouts and he was gunned down in a firefight with the Israel Defence Forces before he could fully explain his perplexing behaviour.

In lieu of a satisfactory explanation, I have decided to take this opportunity to fictionalize my own ending to the unfinished story of the aborted bombing. I have done so because the promise of a new year beckons so sweetly and I would very much like to begin it on a more hopeful footing than we have lived with for the last four.

I want to believe something is changing.

Here is my fairy tale.

Once upon a time, on a sunny Sunday afternoon in summer, a dyed-in-the-wool hater of Jews and Israel set out to commit an unspeakable atrocity. Nearing the front door of a swank Jerusalem café, he espied through the large pane of glass a very young child seated comfortably between his mother and father. The child smiled cheerfully as he dipped deep into a dish of chocolate ice cream. Raising his eyes, the little boy's eager gaze met that of the approaching suicide bomber. The radiant innocence of the child's expression made a powerful impression on the would-be killer, undermining his firm resolve to carry out his premeditated murder. Poignant recollections of another little boy's laughter, his very own son's, completely sapped his blind fury.

Recalling the tender touch of tiny hands upon his cheeks, Nasser A-Din grew mushy around his iron determination to butcher children – any children, even Jewish ones. Forty-one years of life on earth, he realized in a flash of mental clarity, had taken their toll – things were no longer as clear-cut as they once were, when the fiery young man was utterly convinced of the true path to salvation.

That's when tears welled up in the terrorist's eyes and an uncontrollable trembling overtook him. The powerful longing for his young son's warm embrace clashed with his lust for blood. Suddenly, reflexively, he spun around and ran as fast as he could – away from death and back toward life.

The end.

Hope, as they say, springs eternal.

Some good news on the political front

Following 4,000 years of Jewish tradition, we can be pretty hard on ourselves between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. We confess our sins – individual and collective – in public and berate ourselves for not doing better. The holiday atmosphere around the table is tempered by the reality of ongoing struggles and threats looming on the horizon. We wish each other Shanah Tovah in the hope that next year will be better, while we look backward and realize how little we were able to accomplish.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

But in Israel, there is some basis for optimism – things are finally looking up. Jews from Canada and around the world are coming back, and tourism has recovered tremendously – the airport was full all summer, as were the hotels. The economy is also picking up, and some of the people who were laid off as businesses closed are back on the job.

And after four years of terrorism and political warfare, it is now PA President Yasser Arafat who is on the defensive, fighting a growing rebellion at home and isolation around the world. The number of Palestinian attacks has been steadily declining – the security wall is a success. (The recent double bus bombing in Be'er Sheva was a tragic setback, but does not signal a revival of Arafat's war.) Israeli successes in the war against terror have saved hundreds and perhaps thousands of lives, and they stand in contrast to the apparent helplessness in Russia and elsewhere. In other words, we have done a pretty good job, against the odds.

At the same time, political warfare at the United Nations to brand the separation barrier an "apartheid barrier" and to impose sanctions on Israel as the "new South Africa" is continuing. The Europeans, in a fit of pique over Israeli impudence for keeping Arafat isolated, joined the Arab and Muslim blocks in voting to accept the International Court of Justice's pseudo-ruling against the barrier. (To its credit, Prime Minister Paul Martin's new government in Ottawa distanced itself from Europe by abstaining – a step in the right direction.)

Yet, there are signs of gradual improvement on the political front, largely thanks to the hard work of thousands of individuals in Israel and around the world.

For instance, in response to exposure in the NGO Monitor, which I edit, some of the non-governmental organizations that have exploited human rights claims in order to demonize Israel, such as Amnesty International and the powerful British group known as Christian Aid, have recognized Palestinian terror and corruption. Elsewhere, after a powerful counterattack, the city council of Madison, Wisc., (home to the University of Wisconsin, a bastion of political correctness) rejected a proposal to adopt and give money to the city of Rafah, in Gaza, and to the NGO that fronts for its leaders. And the editor of a prominent medical journal was forced to resign after he authorized the publication of an anti-Israel diatribe that had no scientific or other merit.

Similarly, the hard work of media watchdog groups such as CAMERA and BBC Watch – as well as the Canada-Israel Committee's efforts in Canada – is starting to pay off. The talking heads on television are looking beyond the myths of "Israeli occupation" and Palestinian victimization. There is also a greater (albeit still hesitant) recognition of Israel's vulnerability and the relentless impact of Arab hatred and rejectionism.

At the UN, which is still a bastion of petty dictators and bogus human rights campaigners, there have also been some small but positive changes. For the first time in memory, Syria has been criticized in a Security Council resolution for occupying Lebanon and dismantling Lebanese democracy and freedoms. And the UN's special "peace envoy" Terje Roed Larsen openly criticized Arafat, resulting in an open rift. To gauge the importance of this development, it is necessary to understand that for years, Larsen was Arafat's steadiest visitor and never missed an opportunity to condemn Israel for something.

None of these positive indicators should be taken to mean the political war is over and everyone can stand down. Rather, it shows that anti-Israel myths and propaganda can be refuted, if there is a strong enough effort.

Still, given the gloom and doom of the past four years, it's a significant improvement.

Shanah Tovah.

U.S. struggles to rebuild Iraq in face of revolt

The parallels are remarkably eerie.

In 1917, 2½ years after the British invaded Mesopotamia, an Ottoman dominion that would later be known as Iraq, the commander of British forces, Gen. Frederick Stanley Maude, issued a proclamation stating that Britain had entered Baghdad as a liberator, not as a conqueror.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Three years later, following an announcement by the League of Nations that Iraq would be a British mandate, the Iraqis revolted and Britain was faced with a nation-wide uprising.

Fast forward to April 2003.

U.S. troops, having swept into Baghdad after a successful three-week military campaign to unseat Iraq's brutal Baathist government, toppled a massive statue of its strongman, Saddam Hussein, in the centre of the city.

American officials, from President George W. Bush on down, reiterated their intention to bring peace, stability, prosperity and democracy to a long-suffering country, in what would be the first phase of creating a new Middle East free of dictatorships and the scourge of poverty.

On May 1, Bush triumphantly declared an end to major hostilities in Iraq. But within weeks, an insurgency broke out and the United States and its allies, principally Britain, were confronted with the task of having to suppress it.

Since then, as allied casualties have mounted, the situation has gone from bad to worse. The war in Iraq has become increasingly unpopular among Americans and a millstone around the neck of the Bush administration, which faces an election on Nov. 2. Last month, before the U.S. death toll passed the 1,000 mark, Bush acknowledged for the first time that he had miscalculated in assessing post-war conditions in Iraq. For a president who had always exuded a sense of supreme self-confidence about his decision to press for regime change in Baghdad, his admission – which was seconded by U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell earlier this month – was startling.

Bush's belated acknowledgement came almost three months after U.S. Deputy Secretary of Defence Paul Wolfowitz – a prime architect of the administration's Iraqi policy – conceded that the Pentagon had underestimated the tenacity of the insurgency and admitted that the United States might be forced to keep a significant number of soldiers in Iraq for many more years. In short, the U.S. occupation of Iraq, already badly stained by the Abu Ghraib prisoner abuse scandal, has not quite turned out the way planners in Washington, D.C., had assumed. And it could cost Bush the presidency.

The occupation was predicated on four pillars – establishing security throughout a country geographically the size of California, restoring essential services that had deteriorated under the impact of the first Gulf War in 1991 and subsequent United Nations sanctions, and creating conditions for economic development and the transition to democratic governance.

First and foremost, the United States has failed to quell the rebellion, which has grown incrementally sophisticated and deadly. The organizers of and participants in the uprising run the gamut from disaffected officials of the old regime who are plotting a comeback to Islamic fundamentalists apparently led by a Jordanian militant, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who was inspired by Al Qaeda and, perhaps, encouraged by neighbouring Iran.

The ranks of the insurgents have been bolstered by Iraqi nationalists and foreign fighters, many of whom infiltrated Iraq via Syria's porous border and who regard Iraq as a latter-day Afghanistan.

The insurgency, which began in the so-called Sunni Triangle in and and around Baghdad, has targeted allied troops, Iraqi police, members of the pro-U.S. transitional government, United Nations agencies and simple workers – cooks, cleaners, truck drivers and the like – hired by the Americans. In some cases, foreign workers, diplomats and journalists have been kidnapped and beheaded, and Iraqi Christian churches attacked.

There have been a succession of suicide attacks and roadside bombings. Last week, seven U.S. Marines were killed in a single incident in central Iraq. More ominously, full-fledged uprisings have broken out in Falluja – populated mainly by Sunni Muslims – and in Najaf, a Shiite holy centre where Muqtada al-Sadr, a radical young anti-American cleric commanding the loyalty of many impoverished Shiites, holds sway

In the past few months, U.S. troops have twice attacked Sadr's motley Mahdi Army, holed up in Najaf. But in deference to Shiite sensitivities, and reluctant to demolish sacred buildings such as the Imam Ali mosque and the Shrine of Hussein, the United States has pulled back and agreed to shaky ceasefires.

The last truce in Najaf, brokered in August by Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, the most respected Shiite religious figure in Iraq, did not resolve the thorniest issues, the dissolution of the Mahdi Army and the disarmament of his fighters. Nor has a sporadic uprising in Sadr City, a vast Baghdad slum loyal to Sadr, been quelled. In Falluja, where four American civilians were killed in March, their burned bodies strung up on a bridge in a grisly display, the United States is not faring too well either. This past April, U.S. forces halted an offensive against Sunni rebels, and since then, Falluja has become a safe haven for Islamic extremists and former Baath party officials opposed to the American presence in Iraq. U.S. aircraft have bombed rebel strongholds in Falluja, but the city basically remains in their hands, as does much of Anbar province.

Iraqi Prime Minister Ayad Allawi

The Americans face a dilemma in Falluja, Najaf and Sadr City, which have become "no-go" zones. If they use too much fire power, they will alienate Iraqis. But if they hold back, the insurgents' stature will rise.

American generals thought they broke the back of the insurgency by killing Saddam's two sons and by capturing Saddam himself. But they were terribly wrong. Recognizing this unpalatable reality, the American ambassador in Iraq, John Negroponte, recently urged the Bush administration to shift more U.S. reconstruction aid, totalling $18 billion (US), to upgrade security. In the meantime, the insurgents appear to be gaining ground. "The war cannot be won militarily," Gen. John Batiste, the commander of the First Infantry Division, observed recently. "It really does need a political and economic solution."

In this spirit, the United States has bent over backwards to restore essential services. Yet, despite its best efforts, Iraqis carp about a chronic lack of electric power and clean water. Insurgents trying to destabilize the interim Iraqi government have launched a series of co-ordinated attacks on transmission lines and water purification plants.

And they have repeatedly sabotaged oil pipelines. In the waning days of August, they temporarily brought oil exports, the lifeblood of Iraq's economy, to a grinding halt. At current global prices, Iraq loses $60 million (US) a day in income when oil is not flowing.

Under these circumstances, U.S. efforts to reconstruct Iraq will be painfully slow. Iraq, once one of the powerhouses of the Arab world, may thus be hobbled by economic stagnation. As a result, the unemployment rate – 60 per cent in some regions – will remain dangerously high, and more discontented Iraqis will join the insurgency.

Such is the endemic and rampant violence that the United States transferred power from the Coalition Provisional Authority to an interim Iraqi government on June 28, two days ahead of schedule. Paul Bremer, the U.S. administrator, feared that rebels would try to disrupt the official ceremony, which formally ended the American occupation administration.

The new Iraqi premier, Ayad Allawi, a physician and former Baathist official who ran afoul of Saddam, is reportedly a man of immense strength and willpower. But it remains to be seen whether he and the Americans will be able to foil insurgents' plans to undermine the democratization of Iraq, no small task in itself.

Under the U.S. plan, which was approved by the UN Security Council in June, Iraq will become a federal, democratic and pluralistic state. Elections are scheduled to be held next January, and subsequently, a new national assembly will draw up a permanent constitution and set a date for a fresh round of elections. They will determine the composition of a government that is supposed to represent the interests of Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds, the main ethnic and religious groups in Iraq.

There is no guarantee that the United States can transform Iraq – which has no democratic traditions to speak of – into a functioning and vibrant democracy. Certainly, the effort will be an acid test case in nation-building, a concept the Bush administration had dismissed.

But if Iraq can be rebuilt and reformed, in the face of fierce opposition from a panoply of antagonistic forces, the Middle East will be a better and safer place for all, including Israel.

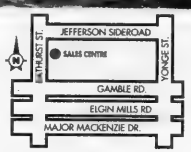
A Better Place to Live



Scientist narrates history TV series in Russian

By SVETLANA BARKAN
Special to The CJN

The Russian version of the award-winning CBC-TV series, Canada: A People's History, was narrated by a local Russian scientist and community activist.

Zelina Iskanderova is the voice of the series, which, in 32 episodes, documents the history of Canada, from prehistory to the 1990s. Beginning in February, the Russian-language series was aired by OMNI.1 Television on Saturdays at 10 p.m.

Canada: A People's History, which won three Gemini Awards, was produced originally in English and French. Along with the Russian version, the series is now out in Hindi, Cantonese, Mandarin, Italian, Greek, Polish and Portuguese.

Iskanderova, who came to Canada with her family from Tashkent, Uzbekistan, a decade ago, has become well- known in Toronto's Russian Jewish community as the "Russian voice" of the series.

She holds a PhD in physics and was the first woman to become an adjunct professor at the University of Toronto's Institute for Aerospace Studies. Currently, she heads the Space Materials Division of ITL, a high-tech company.

Iskanderova has been a lover of literature, arts and music all her life. Her interest in the arts is mentioned in the book Tasting Diversity: Celebration of Immigrant Women and Their Cooking, a collection that includes 50 distinguished Canadian women.

Iskanderova competed with several candidates to become the narrator of Canada: A People's History. Her voice was recorded and the tape was submitted to a committee that included several OMNI television executives, including vice-president and station manager Madeline Ziniak, who speaks Russian.

Iskanderova says she approached the opportunity with great excitement – and some fear. When an OMNI representative contacted her and asked her to become the official Russian narrator of the series, she says she wanted to jump for joy and accepted the offer. But when she was told about the unusual working hours, 5 p.m. to 2 a.m., she felt somewhat overwhelmed at the prospect as she would have to maintain her job at ITL as well. She says that being the narrator for the series was a privilege, but it had its challenges, too.

To prepare, Iskanderova tried to match every word from the original English script with the words in the Russian translation – for all 32 episodes of the series. She also worked on the Russian translation to polish it.

It was often necessary to record the same sentence over and over again and timing was tight. The Russian narration for the series was done in 1½ months. Iskanderova was also responsible for matching the narration with the visuals.

She says that her previous radio experience as a volunteer field reporter covering cultural community events for the Russian Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (CRBC)-Russian Radio helped her while she was working on Canada: A People's History. Iskanderova had been a reporter at the Russian radio station for more than two years before she worked on the series, and her voice was well-known to the Russian community when the Russian version of the CBC-TV series began to air.

Zelina Iskanderova is the narrator of the Russian-language version of the CBC-TV series Canada: A People's History.

As the narrator of Canada: A People's History, Iskanderova became a star in the Russian community. OMNI-affiliated Russian-language program Russian Waves featured her as a guest, and a story about her was published in a newspaper, the Russian Express. The community learned that behind her voice was a strong, independent Jewish woman with a passion for storytelling.

Iskanderova says people approach her in stores, buses, streets and at formal events to thank her for the "beautiful voice and great narration" of Canada: A People's History. From the response she has received from people all over Toronto, it is clear that people in the Russian community felt grateful and pleased to hear the Russian language on a major television channel during prime time.

"It is something that was never offered to the Russian-speaking population [before]," says Iskanderova. "I am extremely proud and thankful to have this wonderful experience, which allowed me to add my voice to a piece of Canadian history.

"This is our new home, and it is extremely important for all generations to recognize Canada's history, to learn [about] its glory and importance on the world map."

Iskanderova says her family, starting with her grandparents, always had a strong connection to their Jewish roots. She is looking forward to celebrating the High Holy Days this year with a sense of gratitude and serenity.

"The series narration has somewhat changed my life," she says, "and I am extremely happy to have gone through that experience."

Diabetes association volunteers honoured

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to the CJN

Three volunteers of the Canadian Diabetes Association's Jewish chapter, Toronto branch, received special merit awards recently at the association's regional annual meeting.

The association's Gary O'Connor, area executive director, Greater Toronto Area Leadership Centre, and Paul McCarten, board chair, presented the awards.

Distinguished Dedication Awards, for 20 years of service, were presented to Shirley Glatt and Esther Schwartz.

They were cited for serving as role models and for their ongoing commitment to the Canadian Diabetes Association (CDA), as well as for helping to enhance the lives of people affected by the disease.

Helen Clinton was presented with a Special Dedication Award for her significant contribution to the association's mission – to be active in diabetes research, education, service and advocacy.

The awards are designed to recognize excellence and to stimulate continuing achievements in those areas. The evening's theme was diversity and multiculturalism.

The Jewish chapter of the CDA meets five times a year at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation. The meetings include guest speakers and informative discussions.

Diabetes is one of the leading causes of death in Canada. Through the CDA's efforts, the disease has become more manageable. The association has improved the lives of Canadians with diabetes and their families.

Missing the point at the Star and the Times

In one particularly jarring paragraph of its lead editorial, "Mr. Bush and the Truth About Terror," (Sept. 2), the New York Times urged U.S. President George W. Bush to "speak seriously about terrorism" by breaking the "stalemate" in which Israel expands its West Bank settlements "while attempting to keep the Palestinians under control with sheer military force."

The Times continued: "The West Bank is not just a breeding ground for terrorists; it is the perpetual wound Arabs use to justify supporting and financing violent extremists."

It is disconcerting when one of the world's leading newspapers, which has long shown understanding about Israel's predicament, places the entire onus for resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict on Israel. Uncharacteristically, the Times ignores Israel's efforts – as well as those of the U.S. government – to strike a more than fair deal ("land for peace") with the Palestinians.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

It also ignores Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's refusal to fulfil any of his obligations, including, foremost, an end to violence. Nor does it point out how Arab regimes benefit from being able to blame Israel for their "perpetual wound" to avoid dealing with their internal failures.

If the Times' viewpoint is badly misguided on this occasion, more troubling still is the sort of thinking evidenced the same day by commentator Haroon Siddiqui in the Toronto Star.

In "Fight terror on all fronts," Siddiqui begins on a fair tack by noting that in the recent terrorist attacks in Iraq, Afghanistan, Pakistan and Saudi Arabia, the perpetrators, as well as the majority of the victims, have been Muslims. He notes that some Muslim groups have, for various reasons, condemned some of these attacks.

But Siddiqui then returns to a familiar refrain, saying that only by "addressing long-standing grievances" in "occupied lands" – which he lists as the territories under Israeli control, Iraq under the United States, Chechnya under the Russians – will the world find an answer to terrorism.

It is fallacious to conflate all these cases as if they're comparable. Regarding Israel, where 16 civilians were murdered in bus bombings in Be'er Sheva just days earlier, Siddiqui wrote: "The Beersheba bombs… were said to have shattered the calm that has prevailed since March. Calm for Israelis, yes, but not for the Palestinians, even civilians among them. They have continued to pay the price of [Israeli Prime Minister] Ariel Sharon's endless drive to crush their resistance."

Siddiqui qualified his thoughts: "Condemn terrorism and launch wars against it. That's the mantra of the age, appropriately so. But we can't stop there. Without fair political solutions, this mantra has proven to be a failure and will continue to be for the foreseeable future."

In effect, by ignoring Israel's genuine offer of statehood to the Palestinians a few years ago, Siddiqui ends up not merely explaining, like the New York Times, how Arabs use Israel to justify terrorism, but actually rationalizing terrorism as "justified resistance to occupation."

Siddiqui avoids any mention of the crucial fact that for terrorist groups such as Hamas, Islamic Jihad and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, and even other parts of Arafat's Fatah faction, the "occupation" they're bent on resisting by murdering and maiming Israeli women and children is Israel itself. This omission is distortive, and misleading to the Star's readership.

Siddiqui must address this issue. The core of the conflict is the refusal of the Arab/Muslim world to accept the legitimacy of Jewish sovereignty in the Middle East. The end of Israeli control of the West Bank and Gaza Strip was within reach until Arafat thwarted it and resorted to violence. Siddiqui ignores this (and Sharon's current attempt to unilaterally withdraw from Gaza) while calling for a "fair" political solution, without defining what he means.

Let him say, for once, loud and clear, that Arab/Muslim regimes ought to at last accept Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state within safe and defined borders, as envisaged by UN Security Council Resolution 242. Only within that atmosphere will Israel be able to achieve the full territorial compromises the world is demanding of it.

Thoughts for the High Holy Days

We Only Keep What We Give Away

Hillel once said to a group of his students, "If a man has 1,000 dinars and gives 300 to the poor, how much does he then have?"

"Seven hundred," the students replied.

"Not so," declared the wise Hillel. "He truly possesses only the 300 dinars he gave to tzedakah. He may lose the other 700 by accident, or in a business venture, or, with luck, he may leave it to his children.

"Therefore, know that all a person truly possesses for eternity is the money that person gives away."

—The Talmud

A Challenge

Doctor Viktor E. Frankl, Viennese psychiatrist and survivor of Auschwitz, relates an incident that he refers to as the deepest experience he had at Auschwitz. He had hidden the manuscript of his first book in his coat, which was taken away from him when he arrived at the camp in exchange for an old ragged one belonging to an earlier victim. Instead of the many pages of his manuscript, he found in the pocket of the newly acquired coat a single page torn out of a Hebrew prayer book containing the words of the Shema.

He interpreted this incident as a challenge to live his thoughts instead of merely putting them on paper.

The Need For Community

• Next time you buy a train ticket, observe. It says, "No good if detached." None of us is.

• Last year, a preschooler who was a regular attendee on Shabbat mornings, came to Yom Kippur services and was heard to say, "What are all these people doing in my synagogue?"

• A woman came to me recently and said, "Rabbi, you won't see me in temple these High Holy Days because I've developed a fear of crowds, agoraphobia." I answered, "Then I suggest that you come the second day of Rosh Hashanah."

The Commanding Voice of Auschwitz

Jews are forbidden to hand Hitler posthumous victories. They are commanded to survive as Jews, lest the Jewish people perish. They are commanded to remember the victims of Auschwitz lest their memory perish. They are forbidden to despair of man and his world, and to escape into either cynicism or otherworldiness, lest they co-operate in delivering the world over to the forces of Auschwitz. Finally, they are forbidden to despair of the God of Israel, lest Judaism perish.

Prayer

During the year to come: may you enjoy good health and happiness; may peace reign over our country and throughout the world; may you receive a kiss from your beloved, a smile from a child; may you have a warm, cosy house with the aroma of good food baking in the oven; may you have wise governors and merciful tax collectors; may you have the companionship of good friends and helpful neighbours; may you enjoy the fruits of your labours; may you celebrate birthdays and anniversaries; may the sun shine on your face; may you see a rainbow; may the Shabbat Queen enter your home with the teachings of the Torah; may you enjoy giving charity with a free hand; may you have an umbrella whenever it rains; may this year be happy, healthy and prosperous for you and your loved ones.

5764 in Jerusalem

By JULIEN BAUER

One year in Jerusalem. Back in Montreal, I'm taking time to reflect on it.

I went to the Kotel, the Western Wall, 16 times. It is indeed not only a most holy place, but also the centre of the Jewish people.

On Friday evenings there, I never missed meeting friends from Israel, whose presence I could anticipate, but I also met people from Canada, the United States, France and other countries. To live one year in Jerusalem does not diminish the attraction of the Kotel; it is where you go first and where you pray last before leaving.

Jerusalem is the city to be in if you want to learn both Jewish and general studies. Every day, thousands of people at every level, from beginners to the highly specialized, flock to shiurim from early morning to late at night, taking classes that are mostly in Hebrew, but also in other languages, including English and French.

Very often the people taking classes do not fit the image of classic talmudic students. Some are old and can hardly walk but still manage to attend classes, while others are women such as Rachel Cohen, a nurse. She said, "I work during the day, take care of my family late afternoon and suppertime, then enjoy a shiur in the evening, at least three times a week."

My best recollection is the Sunday-morning shiur on Moed Katan, given by Rabbi Haim Yankle Bulka, father of Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa. Extremely well prepared, always ready to answer questions, Rabbi Bulka has an outstanding commitment to learning and a love for his fellow Jews.

Once, he became ill and could not give his shiur. When I phoned to wish him refuah shleimah (complete recovery), his first sentence was: "I hope you were told I was sick and did not come to class in vain," as if my time was more precious than his health. This is Jerusalem.

Conferences, symposiums and various learned gatherings are a permanent fixture in Jerusalem. Every day, you have at least one, if not two or three, to choose from. Many of the conferences deal with Jewish and Israeli issues from "The Philosophy and Influence of Rav Soloveitchik" to "Nationalism, Zionism, Israeliness and Jewish Identity." A surprisingly high number of conferences deal with general topics from Canadian studies – I presented a paper at one last June – to "Turkey in the Aftermath of the War in Iraq."

Scholars, neither Jewish nor specializing in Jewish studies, come regularly to Jerusalem. A Sorbonne professor I had not seen since I was a student told me, "In one week in Jerusalem, I have a better opportunity to meet top intellectual minds from Europe than I would have in Paris."

A few anti-Semites, including some Jews, are promoting a boycott of Israeli universities. Their success is limited, not only because of their open anti-Semitism, but also because many professors consider links with Israel and journeys to Jerusalem as an integral part of their professional lives.

When you don't study or do research, what can you do that is special to Jerusalem?

You watch, as I did three times, the robot poking a suspicious luggage – it could be a bomb – and detonating it before it could do any harm. You shop at the open-air market of Machane Yehuda. After awhile, you get on friendly terms with some vendors and chat with them while buying rogelach, coffee, cheese or falafel. By the way, I dream of writing a book, giving one to three Magen Davids for the quality of falafel available in Jerusalem. The best one is in Machane Yehuda, close to Agrippas Street.

But better than anything else in Jerusalem is just walking the city's streets, discovering a new view at every corner, enjoying the tremendous number of children and youth, engaging in conversations with total strangers who are, in fact, acheinu b'nei Yisrael, our brothers, the sons of Israel.

At the dawn of 5765, I wish our brothers and sisters in Israel and the Jewish communities everywhere, Shanah Tovah. May we all meet in Jerusalem.

Julien Bauer, professor of political science at Université du Québec à Montréal, recently returned from a sabbatical year in Jerusalem.

Rosh Hashanah for kids

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Rosh Hashanah is almost here — a time for solemn introspection. But that doesn't mean you and your family can't have some fun while getting ready for the holiday. There are plenty of websites that teach about the holiday through games, puzzles and activities and parents can do with their children between now and Yom Kippur.

Virtual Jerusalem combines a very good introduction to the holiday with games and more. [http://209.58.241.78/vjholidays/rosh/kids.htm] There are holiday-related short stories and plans for creating a calendar, a mitzvah chart and a Jerusalem tzedakah box. The site has a page that tries to demystify the holiday and encourages kids to talk to God. To get things going, it includes comments from children aged four to six. Here's one from Sam, 6: "Dear God: Instead of making people die and having to make new ones, why don't you just hang on to the people you've already got here?"

Jewish Kids Online has a large section of holiday-themed games and activities. There's a section telling kids about common traditions such as lighting holiday candles, eating a new fruit and attending the Tashlich service, where you throw away your sins. [http://tinyurl. com/4pkh2] Print out the site's Tishrei mitzvah trail board game to keep track of a dozen key activities that kids will enjoy between now and Simchat Torah. [http://tinyurl.com/ 67uwp]

The comic page on tshuvah tells the story of two young boys who learn the meaning of truly feeling sorry for the mistakes they have made. (Somebody at this site must have friends in high places, because I was surprised to see that the tshuvah comic was drawn by artist Joe Kubert, former director of publications at DC Comics and known for his work on The Flash, Sgt. Rock and Hawkman series. [http://tinyurl.com/4nxnz]

The learn@JTS Kids' Corner emphasizes activities that parents can share with their children. We are told that we eat symbolic foods on Rosh Hashanah to portend a good year: we eat a fish head for a year in which we will be at the head and not at the tail. Then the website challenges families to adopt some brand-new food traditions. How about eating squash so that "bad luck may be squashed?" [http://tinyurl.com/6vlkm]

SocialAction.com points out that since Rosh Hashanah is the world's birthday, it is appropriate to do something good for the world. Start by having your family finish these phrases: "We thank You for the beauty of the world that we see in…" and "Help us to make our dreams a reality by helping us to…" [http://tinyurl.com/4qb2d]

We may no longer spend weeks huddled over a table preparing New Year's greeting cards. But you and your kids can still send out special holiday wishes, and thanks to the Internet, it now takes less time. There are many sites that let you compose and personalize online cards like FreeWebCards. [www.freewebcards.com/cards/rosh-hashanah/] For other crafts, take look at the ideas at Aish Hatorah, where you can find instructions to make your own tzedakah box and honey dish. [www.aish.com/hhFamily/hhArts/]

If you asked children to draw a pictures that symbolizes Rosh Hashanah, what do you think they would include? That was the challenge posed to children in countries that receive assistance from the Joint Distribution Committee. You can see how young people from India to Siberia to Gamla, Israel, drew on their experiences to wish the world a Shanah Tovah. [www.jdc.org/news_press_100403.html]

Kids who like to colour shouldn't miss the Torah Tots site. They can print out and then decorate holiday symbols such as the shofar and Tashlich. There's also an online jigsaw puzzle in which you slide the little squares around until you make a picture showing apples and honey. [www.torahtots.com/holidays/rosh/rosh.htm]

When you're done that, try the Replace the Pickle quiz. Can you make sense of this example? "We blow the 'PICKLE' after davening during the month of 'CUCUMBER.' The shofar reminds us to do 'RELISH.'"

(Answers: shofar; Elul; tshuvah)

And on that note, I would like to wish all my readers a good year in which you are inscribed in the PICKLE of Life.

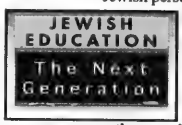
The teaching equation

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

As a new school year begins, many parents are sagging under the weight of their tuition burdens. This is a topic that relentlessly fails to go away, as school fees rise yearly but family budgets often do not. At the heart of the problem is the link between staff salaries, which consume much of a school's budget, and the cost of tuition, which even in the best case is a daunting task for parents. At the very same time as parents bemoan the financial stress of Jewish day school, there is also often a concomitant critique of the quality of the education that is being received for those hard-earned dollars.



But ironically, one of the problems in enlisting talented teachers into Jewish education is the relatively low salaries that such teachers receive in relationship to other skilled professionals. Jewish educator recruitment and retention is a double-edged problem. Often those recruited do not wish to be teachers and reject the call, and those retained are sometimes not best suited to work with young people. But money plays a central role in this dilemma, in ways that parents sometimes fail to fully appreciate (I say this as a parent paying tuitions and feeling the stress like everyone else).

Recently the Jewish educator Cheryl Finkel wrote that " Jewish education is a profession that is not sexy for a young Jewish person… if we could appeal even to a small percentage of them, I don't think we'd have worries about quality…The minute you open your mouth to say double the salary – which I think we need to do – then you've got the tuition to double and that's a terrible burden. That equation by itself is a disaster."

The "disastrous equation" lies at the heart of current discourse about school fees. And if one continues to operate within the equation, then the inevitable circularity of the argument continues – lower salaries means less people attracted to the profession, which often results in less suitable teachers, which leads to parent complaints about value for money, which leads to call for recruiting new teachers, which leads to discussions of teacher salaries, and so on.

Parents are not suddenly going to discover new untapped financial resources, nor are schools going to inherit windfalls, unless of course Jewish communities pump more money into schooling at the expense of other communal projects, a suggestion that is now being raised in several quarters. But perhaps new pools of talented people can be enticed into the profession if the definition of what a teacher does is expanded or enhanced, in return for greater remuneration. This might entail rather radical perspectives about the length of a teacher's year. Instead of two months of summer vacation, perhaps an alternate educational project could be part of the teacher's mandate. Or a teacher's Jewish involvement with students might not end with school time (for many teachers this is already a truth). In Israel currently, many teachers get paid not simply for classroom instruction but for a kind of mentoring that is part of their job description. And the student's own schedule could also be changed in terms of whether a two month summer break is truly beneficial. All of this may seem preposterous to some, but the problem will only grow worse if new strategies for engaging the future are not implemented soon.

Hoenlein speaks out against spy allegations

By REBECCA GLUCK SOBERMAN
UJA Federation

One of the Jewish world's most influencial leaders, Malcolm Hoenlein, is describing charges that a Pentagon mole leaked highly classified information to Israel as "absurd."

The investigation points to a mid-level Pentagon official, Larry Franklin, who is said to be under suspicion of supplying classified information on U.S. policy towards Iran to AIPAC -- The American-Israel Public Affairs Committee -- which allegedly handed material to Israeli officials.

"The investigation should be focused on why and how this information was leaked three days before the Republican National Convention," Hoenlein, the CEO of the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations, told a UJA Federation conference call briefing. "And there is no sensational press about Mr. Franklin still being in his job after an investigation that has been going on for almost two years. He has not been fired or even suspended," he pointed out. AIPAC first learned of the investigation a few weeks ago when two of its employees were questioned. "There are many questions that need to be asked when this matter is resolved," added Hoenlein.

Malcolm Hoenlein

Though angered by the media for, what he considers, poor handling of the information, Hoenlein has been able to make noteworthy observations of others' reactions to the allegations. "What the handling of the incident has done is to enable those with their own agendas against Jews or Israel to vent unsubstantiated accusations." It has also brought about a strengthened support for AIPAC, he said. "People are standing by AIPAC, including senators and other political figures. There have been no cancellations of events. People are looking for ways to show solidarity," added Hoenlein.

Hoenlein is also encouraged by the Jewish community's determination to circulate a positive message. AIPAC has issued a statement calling the allegations "false and baseless" and promising complete cooperation with the authorities.

Jewish Agency for Israel suffers a "direct hit"

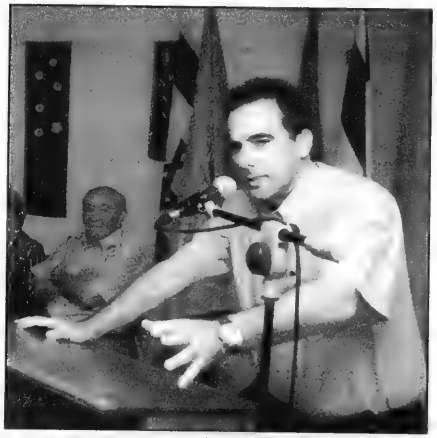
By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) – UJA Federation's overseas partner - was deeply affected by the recent suicide bombing in Beersheva that killed 16 people and wounded 85.

"This time our Jewish Agency family took a direct hit. We knew three of those killed very well," says Jeff Kaye, JAFI's director of resource development and public affairs.

The youngest of the three was Karine Malka, a 23-year old employee of the Jewish Agency's absorption centre. She was killed on her way to work.

"Karine was a role model for everyone," says Moshe Bata, director of the centre. "When we told the children she had been killed, they cried. They are still in shock; they have yet to take it in."



Jeff Kaye

Tekele Tiluant, 33, was the mother of six children. She came to Israel 15 months ago from Ethiopia and was about to leave the Beersheva absorption center for the family's new home in Rishon LeTzion. She was on her way home to make dinner when she was killed, after spending a day shopping for school supplies for her children.

Dozens of the absorption centre's residents assembled in and around the mourners' tent that was erected in the courtyard the day after the bombing. The Tiluant family stood in the middle, surrounded by mourners who lamented and sang dirges in Amharic.

According to Bata, the Tiluant family is "one of the most exemplary families we have ever had...Now, everything has come to an end and the heart weeps."

Karine Malka

Tatiana Kortashenko

The third victim, Tatiana Kortashenko, 49, made aliyah from Ukraine in 2000, and was employed by the Jewish Agency in its Beersheva office. In Ukraine, Tatiana worked as a biology teacher and deputy school principal.

Tekele Tiluant

Her fellow workers describe her as a happy, amicable and well-liked woman who had made many friends.

Tatiana was on her way home from work when the terrorist bus bombings occurred.

"We couldn't reach her on the telephone and we understood that something had happened to her," her niece, Luba Loktinov recalls.

"Once the dust settles, we will be at the side of each and every one of these people in order to help reclaim the lives that have changed forever," says Kaye. "We were there yesterday, we are there today, and we will be there tomorrow. Because we know that this is what we do."

Since September 2000, close to 1,000 innocent men, women and children have been murdered in Palestinian terror attacks. Some 6,500 people have been injured – many seriously – while over 550 children have lost one or both of their parents to terror.

Free genetic screening offered to community

Some inherited diseases result when both parents silently carry the same recessive genetic trait. But, thanks to a group of sponsors, including UJA Federation, a free genetic screening clinic on Sunday, October 24 will offer tests and provide information on ways to protect your family from the devastation of certain fatal childhood diseases. A non-invasive blood test can determine a person's carrier status.

The free clinic, coordinated by the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada (NCJWC) – Toronto Section, is offering the one-day-only screening to test for Tay Sachs Disease, Canavan Disease and Familial Dysautonomia (FD), all common genetic defects found in the Ashkenazi Jewish population.

"Tay Sachs, Canavan and Familial Dysautonomia are inherited fatal diseases that primarily strike young children," says Dr. Annette Feigenbaum. "The diseases affect the central nervous system and cause early death by progressive degeneration. Sadly, there are no known cures."

The free genetic screening clinic will offer screening tests and provide information on ways to protect your family from the devastation of certain inherited fatal childhood diseases. Photo by Lloyd Wolf.

According to Project Coordinator Lorraine Berk, an NCJWC member, "the ultimate goal is to create awareness. Many years ago we only screened for Tay Sachs, but in recent years new diseases have been identified," she says. "We are looking to attract people who are contemplating starting a family. It is crucial that they be properly informed of the silent risk that is attached to being a carrier."

But Dr. Feigenbaum is quick to point out the positive. "Even if you discover that you are a carrier, this does not mean you can't have children. On the contrary, carriers are unaffected by the disease," she explains. Only when both parents are carriers of the same genetic defect, there is a one-in-four chance that the baby will be born with the disease. Then, the results are devastating.

Aside from creating awareness about the three diseases for which the clinic will test, Berk is also looking to spread a message that there are other, less well-known diseases with carrier status.

The one-day free screening was made possible through a generous donation from the Estate of Louis Uger, as well as the following sponsors: the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education; Gerald Richler Family UJA Federation Philanthropic Fund at the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto; National Council of Jewish Women of Canada - Toronto Section; Jacob's Ladder, The Canadian Foundation for Control of Neurodegenerative Disease; Canadian Association for Tay Sachs & Allied Diseases; Dysautonomia Foundation Inc.; and The Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science.

For more information visit www.whatsinyourgenes.com or call 416.633.5100. The clinic will be located at Council House, 4700 Bathurst Street, 9 am – 3 pm. Minimum age is 16 years. Please have the name and address of your family physician available.

Super Sunday kicks off telethon season

First set of telethons for Campaign 2005

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

This coming Sunday, September 19, more than 150 telephones will be put to good use by UJA Federation volunteers as Super Sunday – the first set of critical telethons during Campaign 2005 – begins at the Lipa Green Building.

Super Sunday kicks off Super Week, held until September 23, in which an estimated 10,000 homes will be contacted – 6,000 of those during Super Sunday alone.

Telethon organizers hope to surpass last year's Super Week total of $3 million for Campaign 2005 – a campaign that has already raised over $20 million since its launch at the end of August.

This year's campaign is an Action Plan for a safe Jewish future that will see new dollars invested in four key areas:

• Community Security: UJA Federation has initiated a special community task force to review local security needs, especially at schools and community centres.

• A Strong Jewish Voice: UJA Federation is supporting the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) and other organizations that stand up for Israel and speak forcefully against antisemitism.

• Building a Stronger Israel: Campaign 2005 will invest in several important programs with an emphasis on young people, victims of terror, new immigrants, and Israel's vulnerable.

• Empowering a New Jewish Generation: Campaign 2005 will invest in training programs for young adults to help them counter antisemitism, and initiatives such as birthright israel and March of the Living, to build a stronger connection to Israel.

An estimated 750 volunteers are expected to take part in Super Week. Among them is Richard Bennett, a member of UJA Federation's Young Lawyers Division.

"I've been volunteering at UJA telethons for a couple of years now. It's such a rewarding and important way to give back to the community," says Bennett, 39, whose father Donald, chair of UJA's Lawyers and Accountants Division, was recently named as the recipient of the Granovsky Award for his 25 years of campaign excellence.

"I suppose genetics may play a role in my involvement with UJA," he says. "My father definitely got me involved in the campaign. It's such a great way to meet people and, of course, with the increase in antisemitic events in Toronto, this year's campaign is so important."

The telethons will run from 9:00 a.m. to 9:00 p.m. on Super Sunday, and from 6:00 p.m to 9:00 p.m. during the rest of Super Week.

"We've received such an enthusiastic response from volunteers from all kinds of backgrounds," says Mark Satok, who is chairing this year's telethons with Ruth Ekstein. "The commitment shown by these people speaks to the importance of this year's campaign; they understand the situation, and clearly, they want to do whatever they can to make a difference."

To volunteer for this year's telethons, call 416.631.5854.

Super Sunday, the start of Super Week, takes place this Sunday.

Camp Koby offers hope and healing to children

By DVORA WILSHANSKY
UJA Federation

Camp Koby is a summer camp with a twist - it is for youngsters scarred by Palestinian terror. Some of the children or their immediate family members have been injured in terror attacks; others have suffered bereavement.

Seth and Sherri Mandell created the Koby Mandell Foundation after their 13-year-old son Koby and his friend Yosef Ishran were murdered by Palestinians in May 2001. In addition to Camp Koby, the Foundation holds Succot, Chanukah and Pesach camps, and healing retreats for widows, bereaved mothers, and families.

Two hundred youngsters ages 9-18 attended Camp Koby sessions this summer at Kibbutz Negba, participating in fun and games as well as art, movement, music and drama therapy sessions. "These kids are phobic about psychologists," explains Sherri, "so we give them a 'different' form of therapy. We are distinct from other organizations because we got into this with a different orientation. We're not just about distraction and showing people a good time. These kids are carrying the weight of the world."

The Mandells help hundreds of terror-stricken children and their families, including their own. "Camp Koby is so important to me," says Seth. "The kids have a great time and I get refreshed. People who have suffered terror usually don't talk to each other, but the Camp opens them up to dialogue. These kids' homes are not the same; my home is not the same. There are places in Israel I can't go to, like the beach - Koby used to help me put up the tent. I can't go there any more."

UJA Federation's Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto plays an important role, having donated US$ 150,000 to Camp Koby. "Rabbi Reuven Tradburks at Kehillat Shaarei Torah also helps us to raise funds in Toronto," says Seth.

Each child at Camp Koby is a sad reminder of Palestinian terror.

Ruthy and her sister first joined Camp Koby in Pesach 2003. Their 22-year-old brother Staff Sergeant Noam Apter was one of four men murdered at the Otniel Hesder Yeshiva in December 2002, while serving Shabbat dinner.

"At first I felt very strange at the Camp," says Ruthy. "Suddenly you are categorized. The only thing that connected us was tragedy." The sisters couldn't cope, and left in the middle. They returned for the summer session, and Ruthy soon became part of the guidance team. "It forces me to find my inner strength, and to exhibit happiness from within that I wouldn't find otherwise."

Camp Koby brings a smile to the faces of campers as well as the counselors, some of whom are themselves victims of terror.

"The children arrive at Camp Koby with very heavy traumatic/emotional 'baggage'," says Laura Kindler, UJA Federation's representative in Israel. "The support of the Toronto Jewish community, together with the caring team at Camp Koby, helps to heal these children."

Counselor Jackie Goldman tells of one bereaved child who came to Camp Koby saying: "Time doesn't heal the wounds; time just covers up the wounds." When it was time to leave, the child said: "Time doesn't heal the wounds - love does."

Singing in the rain!

Members of Tzofei Tel Aviv, a talented group of Israeli scouts ages 14 to 17, recently enjoyed a little Canadian hospitality as guests of UJA Federation at Niagara Falls, Ontario.

The 19 singers and dancers enjoyed their trip to the falls – which included a wet ride aboard the Maid of the Mist – before performing at the launch of Campaign 2005, held on August 30. After drying off, the group of enthusiastic teens enjoyed a day of fun and food at the Canadian National Exhibition (CNE).

Dentists offer way to identify kids by their teeth

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

For Helen and Bob Ford, grandparents of Dustin, 12, and Heather, 9, child abduction is one of their greatest fears.

When Sheldon Rotman, the family's dentist for more than 20 years, told the Fords about Toothprints bite impressions – a way to track and identify their grandchildren by their unique dental records – the couple thought it was a great idea.

"Dental restorations and X-rays have historically been the primary basis for dental identification. Toothprints is important now because the successful fight against tooth decay has left many children with no cavities and, thus, no dental records," Kerr Dentistry, a U.S.-based dental products manufacturer, explained in promotional material for Toothprints.

"An unrinsed Toothprints also captures saliva, which is a powerful source of our scent, making Toothprints effective for scent-dog tracking."

Dr. Sheldon Rotman, left, and Dr. Jeff Glaziel from Carville Family Dentistry in Richmond Hill. [Cara Edell photo]

In the United States, police, district attorneys, school boards, missing children organizations, forensic and private dentists have recognized or endorsed Toothprints bite impressions as a good "just-in-case" identification system.

Peter Banks, director of the National Centre for Missing and Exploited Children in the United States, said when a Toothprints mould is made, "sufficient proteins in the saliva remain on the wafer from which a DNA test can be successfully performed."

Developed by David Tesini, an associate clinical professor at Tufts University's dental school in Boston, Toothprints is a patented, arch-shaped thermo-plastic wafer that records an individual's unique dental characteristics.

After a child bites down on a softened wafer for 20 to 50 seconds, a mould is formed that shows the size and shape of the teeth and their position in the dental arch. The wafer is then sealed in a plastic bag and given to the child's parent or guardian for safekeeping.

"I think it's a great opportunity to have this done," Helen Ford said at a Toothprints demonstration session earlier this month at Hillcrest Mall.

"It's protection. It's like getting a hand print, only it's a mouth print."

Karen Alexander, the office manager for Rotman's practice, Carville Family Dentistry of Richmond Hill, said Rotman brought Toothprints to Canada.

"He was in New York last November at a dental convention and saw that… nobody was doing that much with Toothprints here and thought it was a good thing to do for the public, especially with what's going on these days," she said.

Alexander, herself a mother, said some people "do not want to think down the road" and accept the possibility that their kids could go missing. But parents have to take every precaution, she said, "in the chance that, God forbid, something were to happen to their children."

She said dentists suggest children should take an initial bite impression at age three, repeating the procedure at age seven or eight and again at age 12 or 13.

Rotman and his dental partner, Jeff Glaziel, didn't charge for the procedure at the mall, but they encouraged donations to York Central Hospital.

Howard Halpern and his daughter Meredith.

H. Halpern Esq. continues long family tradition

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

"The name Halpern has been over the doors of men's wear stores in this city for more than 75 years," says Meredith Halpern, manager of H. Halpern Esq., an upscale boutique for gentlemen in the lobby of the InterContinental Hotel on Toronto's Front Street West.

Generations of Torontonians bought their bar mitzvah suits at the original Halpern's on Yonge Street at Melrose, recalls Meredith as she and her father, proprietor Howard Halpern, show off their colourful and stylish shirts, ties, cufflinks and, yes, socks.

Spiffed out in the sort of sartorial elegance that lines the shelves of H. Halpern Esq., the father and daughter are the second- and third-generation inheritors, respectively, of a family tradition that began when Howard's father, Max Halpern, opened the original store in 1928 along what was then a dirt road at the city limits. The family lived upstairs.

Howard, now 62, swept floors and worked in the warehouse from the age of eight. Both he and his brother Cecil joined the business as adults, but when the firm began specializing in uniforms around 1970, Howard left to found H. Halpern Esq.

In the 1980s and 1990s, the company grew into a chain with 11 stores across southern Ontario, then downsized to its present location in the InterContinental (formerly the Crowne Plaza), where it has had a store for 20 years.

The hotel is adjacent to the Metro Convention Centre and H. Halpern Esq., the only shop in the lobby, attracts carriage-trade customers from all over the world.

Many come in and spend $89.50 or $195 or more for a shirt suitable for both a corporate boardroom and the golf course – and one that will ensure they'll be noticed.

"Our shirts are unique," says Howard. "We try to create non-mainstream merchandise, whether it's a collar treatment, cuff treatment or an unusual design."

The store's exotic Italian shirt labels as well as its own "Elegance by H. Halpern Esq." label attract an unusual mix of clients, Meredith says.

"Recently, we had at the same time in the shop, a Jewish gentleman in his late 50s from Queens buying the exact same shirts as two of the Harlem Globetrotters… We have a young black demographic from the United States, including a lot of deacons and preachers."

French cuffs and old-fashioned hi-boy collars from the 1950s have become popular again, Howard observes, but not in the same semi-formal context as yesteryear.

"Even the younger generation are wearing these as party shirts to go nightclubbing – without a tie, untucked," he says. "Now they wear them with jeans."

Some customers return home and place additional orders with the shop, sometimes totalling $2,000 or more. In response to last year's sharp downturn in convention business, as well as a recent four-month period of hotel renovations, the firm has concentrated on building up its mail-order business and developing a website.

The company still conducts itself according to the golden rule Max Halpern instilled in his son decades ago. "'Don't sell something to a customer that you yourself wouldn't wear. It has to make sense,'" Howard quotes.

"Our shirts are for people who want to show off their 'bling,'" says Meredith. "I laugh at this expression. 'Bling' has apparently been put in the dictionary. It's like the sparkle off the diamond. It means people who like to show off their money, people who want to stand out from the crowd."

The Centre for Jewish Studies at York University

An Innovative Environment for Scholarship and Growth

MESSAGE FROM THE DIRECTOR

Rosh Hashanah is an unusual holiday. From one perspective it is firmly centred on the past – on remembering ancient events – even as far back as the creation of the world – and on introspection and re-evaluation of the more recent past of our own lives. But it is also a holiday of looking forward, of pondering if there are ways that we can break away from old patterns and come up with new ideas for self improvement.

We at York's Centre for Jewish Studies strive to accomplish both of these goals in our academic activities. We believe in the study of the past – the recent and the ancient past – and feel that students, Jewish and non-Jewish, will be enriched by exposure to Jewish texts and Jewish thought. But we are also eager to experiment, to try new models, and to expand the boundaries of the possible. We attempt to innovate by teaching about Judaism in an interdisciplinary manner. We teach about the Shoah both in the classroom and in situ, by taking a select group of Canadian students to Poland and Germany to learn what they cannot learn from books. We are proud of our Jewish Teacher Education program which, in the unusual setting of a public university, successfully trains teachers for Jewish schools of all denominations. We are experimenting with cutting-edge technologies that allow us to provide professional development, through the internet, to teachers of Judaica throughout the world.

We are very grateful for the support that we have received for our efforts from the local community. On behalf of all the members of the Centre, I extend greetings to the Jewish community for the year 5765. May this be a year of respect for the Jewish past combined with innovative thinking about the Jewish future.

Marty Lockshin, Director

CENTRE HIGHLIGHTS 2003-2004

1. Jewish Teacher Education
The Centre's highly successful program in Jewish Teacher Education, in collaboration with York's Faculty of Education, continues to grow and flourish with more than 50 students enrolled. The five-year program including one year spent in Israel, is held in high esteem by other universities, the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto Board of Jewish Education, and within the community.

2. "Merkaz i.t. L'Morim"
A partnership of the Centre for Jewish Studies, York's Faculties of Arts and Education, and the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto Board of Jewish Education is in the third year of a pilot program to make professional development for Jewish teachers available and accessible through the internet by offering courses online through a project called Merkaz i.t. L'Morim. More than 50 teachers from across Canada, the United States, England, Australia and Israel have benefited. The project is supported by many donors including, the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, through its Nathan and Lily Silver Family Education Fund.

3. Leonard Wolinsky Lecture
On a wintry Sunday in January, more than 200 people came to York University to hear a public lecture on "The Jewish Diaspora in Modern China". This was the annual Leonard Wolinsky Lecture on Jewish Life and Education and was delivered by Professor Xu Xin, director of the Centre for Judaic Studies at Nanjing University in China.

Protecting the vulnerable and safeguarding Jewish rights

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash, B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Partner, Beard Winter LLP

Even if you haven't seen Fahrenheit 9/11, we all know that, according to director Michael Moore, George Bush is the real oppressor of the Arab world and the great deceiver of the American people. A columnist recently wrote that there is no Hollywood answer to Moore, no one to challenge his propaganda.

Anyone who has seen the movie Osama will beg to disagree. An MGM / United Artists release that you can catch at any video store or on Rogers On Demand, Osama is a true story about an Afghani girl forced to dress up as a boy because the Taliban would not allow girls or women to work to feed their families.

Rights of individuals and society at risk

Without ruining the ending, I urge you to see this sad but beautiful movie. It reminds us that without George Bush and the liberation of Afghanistan by American forces and our heroic Canadian soldiers, the girls and women in Kabul would still be enslaved, hungry, and — in many cases — sex slaves. My disgust with Fahrenheit 9/11 is only intensified after seeing this movie. Fear of the Taliban has many Ontario residents terrified that our provincial government is permitting sharia (Koran-based) family law to be practiced in Ontario. What is worse, some fear that Ontario courts will be obliged to enforce the ruling of such sharia courts.

Certain Ontario groups are particularly insistent that many Muslim women will feel compelled, against their will, to participate in these sharia courts that mete out male-oriented decisions which reduce their rights below Ontario family law standards. In other words, they may lose custody of their children and receive meager financial support or unfair property distribution. Moreover, they claim that under sharia law they will not obtain a fair hearing from Muslim preachers.

Some have called for the removal of the right of any religious courts to make decisions concerning family law that would be enforceable by an Ontario court. As a result of these complaints, Premier Dalton McGuinty has just announced a review of Ontario's Arbitration Act. This review will be conducted by Marion Boyd, Ontario's former Attorney General under Ontario's former NDP government.

Ms. Boyd will face certain challenges in this undertaking. First, Jewish courts have been in operation for generations without complaint to the government by anyone. Indeed, Article 27 of Canada's Charter of Rights protects the rights of each religious and cultural group to such courts, so long as they are conducted fairly. More importantly, Ontario's Arbitration Act, as currently written, does not permit courts to enforce any decisions by a religious court if those decisions are arrived at unfairly.

Rights to proper religious divorce jeopardized

In Jewish law, a Jew who wishes to follow his religion observantly cannot go to a non-Jewish court to resolve a family law dispute, any more than he or she can break one of the Ten Commandments. He must go to a Beth Din (a Jewish religious court), but neither he, nor the Jewish community, nor any Rabbi can compel his wife to do so. She is free to go to an Ontario court, and often does. Then again, she often doesn't, preferring to exercise her religious and constitutional right to settle her matrimonial dispute privately, outside of the embarrassment of a public forum, with clerical advisors and under Jewish law. Moreover, Jewish law stipulates that, as a first step, the rabbinical court is to promote reconciliation through a form of marriage counseling. Should such reconciliation fail, mediation of the couple's dispute is then attempted before a formal hearing is convened to decide the dispute under Jewish legal principles. Some couples prefer to deal with their estrangement in this way rather than going to an Ontario court.

If Ontario actually eliminates the rights of Jews to have their own courts — which they have maintained without hindrance for thousands of years — because certain Islamic women feel threatened by Taliban jurisprudence, Ontario will be the first and only common-law jurisdiction in the world to do so. Moreover, Islamic non-sharia courts that have also operated peacefully in Ontario will be unreasonably threatened.

The other problem is that Canadian legislation designed to protect Jewish and Islamic citizens from spouses who unreasonably withhold their consent to a religious divorce could be threatened by any suggestion that the power of such religious courts be curtailed. Currently, Section 21.1 of the Divorce Act and Section 2(4) of Ontario's Family Law Act allow Judges to take away the financial rights — or even the rights to visit children — of men or women who refuse to grant their spouse a religious divorce. (In the past, such recalcitrant spouses would sometimes blackmail their wives before agreeing to the divorce.)

Ability of women to remarry compromised

Without a religious divorce, observant Jewish and certain Islamic women cannot religiously remarry, and Jewish women cannot have further children unless and until they obtain their husband's consent to a religious divorce. Fortunately, since this legislation came into effect in 1986 (in Ontario) and 1991 (in Canada as a whole), the problem has eased in Ontario dramatically. However, if the ability of religious courts is taken away, a Jewish couple will not even be able to obtain a religious divorce in Ontario. This process may even be problematic for an Islamic couple!

The solution? Under the Divorce Act, when two parents want a divorce (one with custody of a child, the other with access), the couple approaches a Judge, who often grants the divorce "on consent", without any bickering. However, the Divorce Act will not allow the Judge to grant this divorce unless he / she is satisfied that the parent with access is paying the other parent the correct amount of child support under Canadian law, meaning in accordance with the access parent's level of income. Even if the couple has agreed on a monthly amount that is lower than the Child Support Guidelines, the Judge can insist that the higher "legally correct" amount be paid before he grants the divorce.

When one religious group suffers, we all do

Similarly, Ms. Boyd could recommend that before any family law decision from a religious court be enforced by an Ontario court, a Judge must be satisfied that the people who participated in the court did so voluntarily. Affidavit evidence affirmed before a lawyer, Certificates of Independent Legal Advice and, if the Judge requires it, testimony in open court are all means of ensuring such satisfaction. However, eliminating the rights of all religious groups is not an option. Impediments to freedom are never welcome: not on erev Rosh Hashanah, not any time.

On behalf of myself, my family and the firm of Beard Winter LLP, I wish you a Happy and Healthy New Year.

PETA exhibit blocked in Toronto

perished in the Holocaust. The same number of animals is killed every four hours for food in the United States alone."

PETA members also handed out pamphlets quoting Jewish writer Isaac Bashevis Singer, a vegetarian, as saying: "To animals, all people are Nazis."

In Britain, only its introductory panel was permitted to be shown publicly. This section carries a quote by European vegetarianism advocate Helmut Kaplan: "The least we can do to help end this holocaust is adopt a vegetarian diet."

The exhibition's co-ordinator Matthew Prescott, 22, who told The CJN he is Jewish and that many Polish relatives on his mother's side died in the Holocaust, defended the exhibition as a necessary means of provoking the public into thinking about the issue.

"For 25 years, PETA has been trying to get people to listen… People need to be shocked," he said.

"I grew up on stories of relatives shipped off to be slaughtered. The most striking thing to me was that everyone else just went on with their lives, and ignored the box cars. I realized we are doing the same thing to animals today."

He added: "I think my relatives who died in the camps would be proud of this campaign."

Prescott said he has heard from "thousands" of Holocaust survivors and "many" of them support PETA's use of this analogy.

PETA spokesperson Ben Goldsmith, 22, who also said he is Jewish, said his grandparents had to flee Germany after the Nazis came to power. He said both his grandmother and mother became vegetarians as a result of his efforts.

At first, he said, he was afraid of what his family's reaction might be to the "Holocaust on your Plate" campaign. But after some discussion and thought, he said, they became supportive.

Passerby Morton Bessner, a lawyer, said he found the exhibition "profane" and that he was appalled.

"To try to depict what was the extermination of a people because they were Jewish as equal to the killing of animals for food is a desecration to the memory and honour of the people who died, and minimizes their tragedy… The metaphors are totally incompatible."

Another passerby, Harold Chernofsky, called the display "shock therapy."

"I'm an aspiring vegetarian, but you can't compare humans being killed to animals being killed for sustenance," Chernofsky said. However, he granted PETA's right to freedom of expression and added the exhibit may have some value in reminding people of the horrors of the Holocaust.

PETA claims to have 800,000 members and supporters worldwide. Goldsmith said it has many members in Canada, but he could not give a figure.

Congress allowed to intervene in Roma case

The Supreme Court of Canada has granted Canadian Jewish Congress intervenor status in an appeal of the acquittal of six white supremacists who were charged with promoting hatred against Roma.

In 1997, opponents of recent Roma immigrants paraded outside the Lido Motel in Toronto, carrying placards that encouraged passing motorists to honk if they hate Gypsies.

The young men were charged with promoting hatred against Roma but were acquitted in 2000 when the trial court ruled there was no evidence that Roma and Gypsies are necessarily the same group of people. That finding was upheld by the Ontario Court of Appeal in May 2003.

In a statement, Congress said it was happy the Supreme Court would hear the case.

"We feel a strong kinship with the Roma people, who were also victims of the Nazi regime," said Congress' Ontario chair Joel Richler. "It is important to us that we are able to work together today to deal with neo-Nazis and white supremacists."

Student studies surgery in Ecuador

NEW YORK — While many students spend their first year of medical school sitting in a classroom memorizing facts about anatomy, biochemistry and microbiology, Jared Ament of Toronto learned how to perform surgery out of a truck.

This summer, Ament completed a month-long externship in Ecuador through Child Family Health International (CFHI).

"Since going to Costa Rica on a volunteer trip several years ago, I have always been fascinated with South American culture," says Ament, who is enrolled in the Ben-Gurion University of the Negev Medical School for International Health, a collaborative program with Columbia University Medical Center. "I wanted to see first-hand the disparities between the health-care systems of Ecuador and Costa Rica."

While in Ecuador, Ament visited local hospitals and clinics, participated in vaccination programs, and performed physical exams of children in mountain villages – all under the supervision of local physicians. Among the patient population in those areas, he encountered parasites, malnutrition, extremely poor sanitary conditions and lack of access to clean drinking water.

The centrepiece of Ament's experience were week-long excursions into remote areas with a mobile surgical unit. "Surgery was literally performed out of the back of a truck," he notes. "This particular mobile unit was donated by the United States and provided sterile conditions for surgery in areas where patients have never before had access to any kind of health care."

Ament says, "Being a student in a medical school with an international health curriculum allowed me to approach this externship in an open-minded and culturally sensitive way. This experience solidified my aspirations to pursue a career in surgery and assist in the developing world."

The Medical School for International Health is a joint venture between Ben-Gurion University of the Negev in Be'er Sheva, Israel and Columbia University in New York City. Since 1998, it has educated approximately 200 men and women from all corners of the world.

In addition to the basic science courses and clinical rotations found in American medical schools, students in this medical school learn about cross-cultural communication, disaster relief, refugee health, preventive nutrition, and health-care economics.

Particular attention is also paid to conditions such as malaria, tuberculosis and diarrheal diseases – which affect a majority of the world's population, but receive only a fraction of the world's resources for medical research and treatment.

Participants spend their first three years attending classes at Ben-Gurion University in Israel and can then spend up to four months training at Columbia-affiliated hospitals in New York. During their fourth and final year of medical study, students put their knowledge into action through a hands-on, two-month clerkship in places such as India, Kenya, Ethiopia, Peru, or Nepal.

National Jewish campus body begins second year

aBy FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The national Jewish student community – at an estimated 34,000 young adults – is the third-largest Jewish community in Canada, after the Greater Toronto Area and Montreal, according to Barbara Bank, chair of National Jewish Campus Life (NJCL).

A division of UIA Federations Çanada (UIAFC), NJCL was created last year as a resource to more than two dozen campuses across the country. By the end of the school year, leaders expect to be dealing with students at almost 30 schools.

To clarify the relationship between NJCL and the better-known Hillel groups, Lance Davis, NJCL director, explained that the two groups have a partnership. "We provide resources, we bring campuses together to talk to each other, and we serve as an advocacy body at a national level [to advocate for funding for common needs of Jewish campus groups across the country].

"They [Hillel] are the ones who actually put those resources to work. That's the beauty of the partnership. I give credit to our local staffs for all the success that happens on campus."

With a $1 million allocation from what is now known as the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA, at that time the Israel Emergency Cabinet, under the auspices of UIAFC), NJCL invested in four basic areas for the 2003-04 year, said Davis.

As part of its efforts, seven Israel advocacy specialists were hired, three in Toronto, and one each in Montreal, London, Winnipeg and Vancouver. An eighth has been added for the coming year, bringing the total to two in Montreal.

In March, Arieh Rosenblum was hired as NJCL's director of Israel Affairs – in effect, a national version of the local advocacy staffers.

Funding was also directed toward outreach programming to Jewish and non-Jewish students who had not yet formed opinions on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Projects included bringing in non-confrontational pro-Israel speakers and a campus tour by an Israeli deejay to celebrate Israel and promote peace.

At the University of Western Ontario – which has between 2,500 and 3,000 Jewish students and the largest residential Jewish student population in Canada – NJCL's results were measurable, with the number of "core Israel activists" in London up to 260 students from 140 the previous year, said Davis.

Likewise in Vancouver, the number of core activists increased from 15 to 140. He attributes the increases to the efforts of staff Israel advocacy experts.

This year, in partnership with the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) and Birthright Israel, NJCL has hired three Israeli shlichim – one each in Vancouver, London and Ottawa.

Funding has also been directed at cultivating Jewish student leaders, 38 of whom were taken to Israel for leadership training this summer.

Non-Jewish student leaders were also taken to Israel. "Our hope was that they'd come back inspired by the State of Israel, and sensitive to Israeli issues," said Davis. "We have to ensure that they understand where we're coming from. Giving them a book doesn't necessarily work."

One participant who returned "deeply inspired" had never been exposed to any positive information about Israel, he said. The program has not yet been funded for the coming year, but Davis is hopeful that funds will materialize.

Although NJCL's major funder, CIJA, has cut its allocations by about 20 per cent, "we don't want to give the impression that the program isn't every bit as strong [this year]," said Bank.

In fact, she noted, NJCL is investing in a new area this year: civic responsibility. A related project is a training day Oct. 31 in Ottawa about the Canadian political system and political activism, to be followed the next day by student participation in a political action day.

Also planned for this academic year is a January retreat sponsored by Hillel, NJCL and the Canadian Foundation of Jewish Students, a new student organization that is an outgrowth of NJCL's work last year.

NJCL third largest Jewish community in Canada

On the actual campuses, Davis expects the anti-Israel sector will continue to be active. When interviewed last week, he had just heard about upcoming lectures of concern, at Queen's University in Kingston and at Toronto's York University, scheduled for this week.

Other potential hot spots, based on past experience, include Concordia University in Montreal, Simon Fraser University in Burnaby, B.C., and possibly Dalhousie in Halifax, whose Jewish student population has grown to an estimated 700 to 800 and now has its own Jewish student house and staff person.

Although there are "challenges" at Dalhousie, its Jewish Student Association was named Student Society of the Year, noted Davis.

"Our strategy and focus is not to engage our adversaries in heated argument and ugly confrontation. That's the last thing we want to do," he said. "Nobody wants a conflict-ridden university."

Instead, he explained, NJCL's focus is on the shared values of Israel and Canada.

In addition to Israel advocacy, said Davis, "we want to ensure that the Jewish identity and community building remain strong."

"We've made great strides," said Bank. "But there's still a tremendous amount to do."

YOU CAN'T PUT A BANDAGE ON TERRORISM

But you can help us try to stop the bleeding.

Within seconds, a terrorist strike in Jerusalem can cause devastating losses and massive injuries. Within minutes, victims arrive at the Shaare Zedek Medical Center. Shaare Zedek is overburdened by growing demand for its life-saving emergency care. A new 32,300 square foot Emergency Department, opening this year, will become Jerusalem's premier emergency facility. But equipment costs and other critical needs still outweigh the resources.

You can't put a bandage on terrorism. But you can help us save lives.

Jewish Historical Society celebrates 36 years

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG – The Jewish Historical Society of Western Canada will celebrate its 36th (double chai) anniversary at a gala banquet, Sunday, Oct. 31.

Stephen Lewis, Canada's former ambassador to the United Nations, will be speaking on "Canada's role in addressing human rights violations on the global stage."

The historical society – along with the Jewish Museum and the Freeman Holocaust Centre – became part of the new Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada in 1997. The event will also recognize the historical society's founders and builders.

Stephen Lewis to address gala

The Jewish Historical Society was founded in 1968. It grew out of a centennial project initiated by a group of people affiliated with Canadian Jewish Congress. The group wanted to start an archive collection for the Western region, and were able to collect enough material to mount a display highlighting 90 years of Jewish life in Western Canada.

The new organization's first two presidents were Monty Israels and Isadore Wolch. However, the third president, Harry Gutkin (who passed away this past June), had the greatest impact on the new organization.

Working from a small office across the street from the old YMHA building downtown, Gutkin served as president of the organization for almost 20 years. He had a small but dedicated staff to work with and little funding.

"Harry's involvement allowed the historical society to flourish," says Gerry Posner, a past president of the Jewish Heritage Centre and dinner co-chair (along with Roz Usiskin who succeeded Gutkin as president). "We were able to assemble the greatest collection of archives of any Jewish community in Canada."

Under Gutkin's leadership, the historical society organized its first major exhibit, "Journey into our Heritage" – a look at the history of Western Canadian Jewry – in 1972. Gutkin produced a pictorial book of the same name as a follow-up to the exhibition.

Other exhibitions followed including one on Selkirk Avenue (Winnipeg Jewry's main business street in the early half of the 20th century), the lost world of Polish Jewry, and the Jewish farm colonies in Western Canada.

Posner says the banquet organizers hope to raise $40,000 to $50,000 for the Jewish Heritage Centre. He notes that both the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and government funding bodies have cut back on financial support for the centre in recent years.

"We have to find ways to make up the decline in our revenues," he says, noting that this is the only the fourth time in 36 years that the historical society/heritage centre has held a fundraising dinner.

Roz Usiskin adds that the banquet is also a way to raise the organization's profile in the community. "Through the Jewish Historical Society of Western Canada, we can preserve our community's legacy for future generations," she says.

Birnbaum leaving CJC for new position in education sector

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – David Birnbaum, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q), for almost 5½ years, is leaving the organization.

But he's returning to familiar terrain. A one-time spokesperson for the Protestant School Board of Greater Montreal (PSBGM), Birnbaum, 48, starts work in early October at the downtown Stanley Street offices of the Quebec English School Boards Association (QESBA), where he will succeed Jeff Polenz as executive director.

QESBA is the umbrella advocacy organization for the province's nine English-language schools boards, including two of Montreal Island's main boards, the English Montreal School Board and the Lester B. Pearson School Board. The schools under the nine boards are responsible for the education of 100,000 anglophone Quebec students.

"I like to think of this as a very positive step," Birnbaum said in an interview. "Not that I'm leaving something, but that I'm going towards something new and challenging."

Birnbaum leaves CJC-Q after working under three presidents – Dorothy Zalcman Howard, Joseph Gabay and Jeffrey Boro – and after taking the region through historic times for Montreal's Jewish community.

Birnbaum said he will miss the work. "I have to say the good by far outweighed any bad."

In a Sept. 2 letter of resignation, Birnbaum said he was leaving with a "heavy heart," but added, "I know I leave behind a tremendous organization which continues to play an essential and effective role in furthering the cause of the Jewish people of Canada.

"More particularly, I say farewell to a staff team that has honoured me with its excellence, loyalty, and above all, friendship."

Birnbaum also paid tribute in the letter to CJC-Q's lay leadership, including Boro.

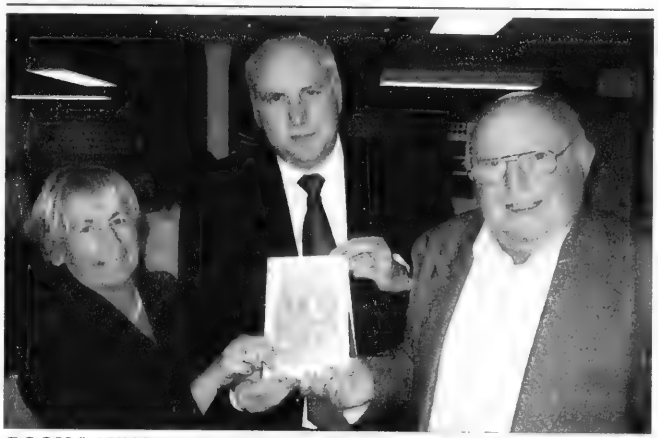
"I know that the bold, compassionate and imaginative leadership you have shown in your initial months will carry through your entire term," he wrote to Boro.

Becoming executive director of CJC-Q was Birnbaum's first professional position within the Jewish community. He started in May 1999 – succeeding Jack Jedwab – after serving as executive directer of Alliance Quebec. Besides his position with the PSBGM, Birnbaum's career has also included work as a journalist and in public relations.

Among the major events CJC-Q responded to during Birnbaum's professional tenure were the controversial visit to Montreal of Austrian politician Joerg Haider and the Yves Michaud affair in 2000, the aftermath of Sept. 11, 2001, and major rallies responding to the wave of suicide bombings and showing solidarity with Israel.

He also had to deal with the infamous Concordia University demonstrations over the visit of Benjamin Netanyahu in 2002, the "Jews in Arab Lands" conference of 2003, the international anti-Semitism conference of 2004 and one of the most traumatic incidents in memory for Montreal's Jewish community, the arson at the United Talmud Torahs' elementary school in St. Laurent on the eve of Passover this year.

In his new job, Birnbaum will work under QESBA president Marcus Tabachnick, who also chairs the Lester B. Pearson School Board.



BOOK LAUNCH: Bernie Farber, centre, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, was the guest speaker at last week's launch at Israel's Judaica Centre of Light at the End of the Tunnel, the memoirs of local Holocaust survivor Isadore (Izzy) Light, right. Joining them was Light's wife, Marylyn. The book recounts Light's survival as a child in the Lodz ghetto, Buchenwald and Auschwitz. [Ron Csillag photo]

Israeli movie wins top prize at film festival

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The phrase "always a bridesmaid, never a bride," definitely didn't apply at this year's Montreal World Film Festival as the Israeli film, The Syrian Bride (Hacala Hasurit), captured four awards, including the Grand Prix of the Americas as the best film in official competition.

A co-production with Germany and France, the movie also won the Air Canada People's Choice Award as the public's favorite film, and garnered the Fipresci (International Film Critics) and Ecumenical prizes.

It was the first time that an Israeli film won first prize at the Montreal World Film Festival.

"This film shows the courageous choices that have to be made in order to overcome the emotional and political barriers that separate families," the Ecumenical jury said.

There's no question that the film – which depicts the frustrations at the Israeli-Syrian border of a Druze family living in the Israeli-controlled Golan Heights seeking to marry off its daughter, Mona (Clara Khoury) to a well-know Syrian TV personality, Tallel (Derar Sliman) – struck a chord with audiences and the jury, which was led by veteran director Claude Ziti of France.

The film included fine performances by all involved, and was co-written by an Israeli Jew (Eran Riklis, who also directed) and a Palestinian (Suha Arraf, an ex-journalist).

The bride (Clara Khoury) sits among her family in Eran Riklis' The Syrian Bride.

The Syrian Bride contains only one character who is Jewish, an officious Israeli notary who does not make it any easier for the two lovebirds (who have never actually met) to meet across the border. But he is no more likable than the Syrian border guard who really couldn't care less if the couple weds.

The actors who stand out in this film are Makram Khoury (who also happens to be Clara Khoury's actual father) as the family patriarch, Hammad, Ashraf Barhoum as Marwan, Hammad's son, who provides the comic relief as a self-styled playboy who strikes out every single time, and Hiam Abbas as Mona's sister, Amal, who symbolizes the forces of modernism against the sometimes contradictory forces of tradition.

How is Israel portrayed? Even though it is not a major "character" in The Syrian Bride, Riklis and Arraf, perhaps in deference again to political correctness, seem eager to be balanced, equal-opportunity critics. The Israelis are occupiers, pure and simple, of the Golan, and not particularly lovable ones, with an occupier's mindset. But by the same token, Druze and Syrians – except for Amal's character – are not exactly portrayed as receptive to the forces of progress.

In a previous interview, Riklis, who has previously directed such well-known Israeli films as Cup Final (1991), Zohar (1993), and Vulcan Junction (1999), described his film as, "an attempt to contribute by creating a film out of love. Love of freedom, love for the spirit of freedom, love for the physical and emotional landscapes that surround us, all of us. A love for women who fight for their place in the world and a love for people who still dream and hope – here, across the border, everywhere."

Riklis, in The Syrian Bride, seems to have succeeded, despite a message that comes across as a bit preachy at times.

A month before being screened in Montreal, The Syrian Bride was also picked as audiences' favorite movie at the Locarno Film Festival in Switzerland.

Artist exhibits portraits at the Russian consulate

MONTREAL – Russian-Jewish émigré artist Alexei Dymov had his series of portraits of famous Russians exhibited at the Russian consulate here recently.

The show, "Le Portrait Russe: De l'icon à aujourd'hui," also included some of the first works in his new series called "Great Canadians: Portraits and Beyond."

More than 100 guests attended the one-day exhibition, including Alexandre Trudeau, whose late father, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, is among the subjects.

Trudeau among the subjects

Dymov came to Montreal in 1998 under the "100 families" program, organized by Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) and the Quebec government, to expedite the immigration of Jews in the former Soviet Union.

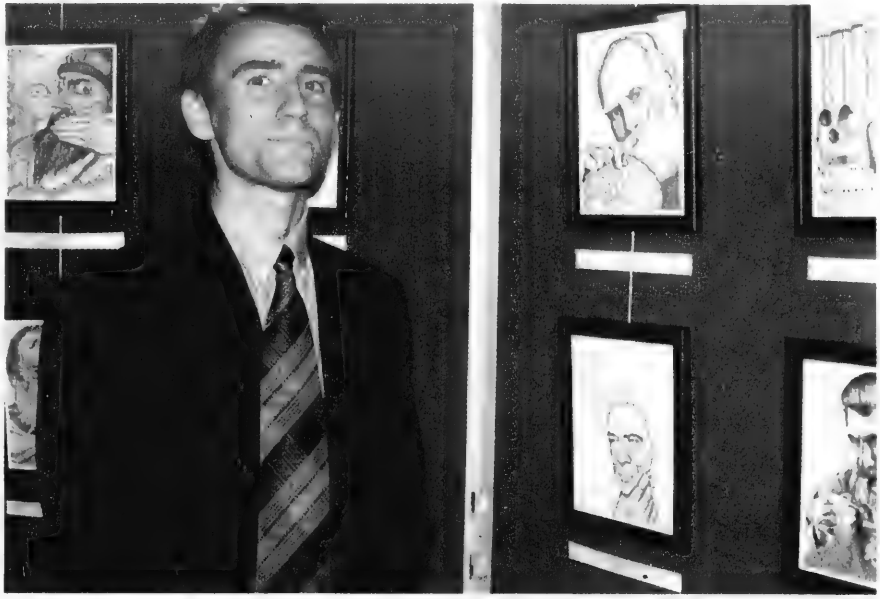
Dymov is developing yet another series "Great Jews: Portraits and Beyond," which will be of Jews who, throughout history, have made outstanding contributions in fields ranging from religion and science to business.

Dymov received a grant for the "Great Canadians" and "Great Jews" series from the Fondation du maire de Montréal and has founded his own company, Creative Reflections.

The Russian portraits have been published in book form and were shown at Book Expo America in Los Angeles and at the Frankfurt Book Fair last year.

Dymov has worked for JIAS as a graphic artist, producing logos for its Welcome Centre, and has designed posters for the March to Jerusalem.

He describes the "Great Jews" project as a very personal one. "It is based on the desire to show the great faces of Israel, the homeland of those who shaped the world as we know it… I really want peace to come to the spiritual homeland of human civilization. I believe that art as a weapon is able to fight for that."



Alexei Dymov stands in front of some of his portraits of famous Russians at his exhibition hosted by the Russian consulate.

Comic entertained our troops in Afghanistan

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — "I just flew in from Kabul, and boy, are my arms tired!" That twist on the old Henny Youngman joke could apply to local comic Joey Elias, who returned recently from Afghanistan after being part of a show tour to entertain Canadian troops stationed there.

Elias' mother, Hannah Eliashiv, an educator at the Jewish People's School and Peretz Schools, was frantic about her son's welfare, the entertainer said in an interview shortly after his return.

"She thought I was absolutely nuts," said Elias, who once worked at Bialik High School and now, at 32, is one of the hottest local stand-up comics around. "So did my grandmother.

"But I knew they wouldn't really take us directly into a hostile environment."

Elias went to Kabul to MC seven shows over three weeks with popular Quebec comedian Dominic Paquet – both alumni of the Just for Laughs comedy festival – and other entertainers.

But it wasn't Elias' first foray to some of the world's less friendly travel spots. Previously, he's been on tours to Haiti and Rwanda.

In Afghanistan, the troupe performed for more than 2,000 Canadian Armed Forces troops in shows organized by the Canadian Forces Personnel Support Agency and produced by Phaneuf Productions.

At Camp Julien – one of two camps Canadians soldiers are stationed at – Elias and the others had to wear helmets and flak jackets on 40-degree Celsius days and during occasional sand-storms.

They also slept in tents, used the same showers and port-a-potties as the soldiers and lined up with the troops to eat.

But while "it was no Shabbes dinner," Elias said, the food was quite good, and he immensely enjoyed the whole experience, especially getting to know the soldiers. He found it very fulfilling to entertain them and make them laugh on the other side of the world and so far away from their families.

"These guys were tons of fun, and we were there to have fun."

Elias, at six-foot-four and 300 pounds, was not short of material either. As part of his act, he described, in detail, the convoluted contortions needed for him to use the loo.

It went over so big that "they even wanted to take my picture in the john."

Given his size, there was also no way Elias told the soldiers, that he could "lie low" in the event of enemy fire.

Things are going well in Elias' career. During this year's Just for Laughs festival, he hosted a CBC TV series that showcased some of the festival's best comedy talent. But comedy is his love, and he's happiest when performing it. This summer, he had some gigs in the United States, and this fall, he will travel, mostly through Western Canada for a six-week tour ending in Ottawa.

'These guys were tons of fun, and we were there to have fun'

Elias has also performed in England and was a huge hit there. He plans to return as soon as he can. "They just love comedy over there."

But there's something about Canada that has kept Elias, at least so far, from joining many other Canadian comic expats in Los Angeles.

"I like it here," Elias said simply. "I'm proud to be Canadian and there's enough talent here if we can just stand up to embrace it. I think Montreal and Canada will always be my home."

That is, until the next trip to Afghanistan.

"I'd love to go back in December," he said, when the next rotation of Canadian soldiers is installed there.

Simple to prepare vegetarian dishes

By NORENE GILLETZ

I always get requests from my readers for vegetarian dishes that are special enough to serve to their guests, yet simple enough to prepare for their families, whether or not they are vegetarians. I think you'll be pleased with these scrumptious selections.

Fresh at Home: Everyday Vegetarian Cooking by Ruth Tal Brown and Jennifer Houston (Penguin Canada, $28) will change your perception of today's approach to vegetarian and vegan food. You'll find recipes for beautiful rice bowls and noodles, stews, sandwiches and wraps, soups and salads, smoothies, freshly squeezed juices, energy elixirs and pro athletic shakes. The book is a resource for people who want to venture into vegetarianism but aren't sure how to get started. There are useful tips and techniques, plus more than 125 vegetarian and vegan recipes.

Drawing inspiration from the global kitchen, Brown has turned her restaurant chain Fresh by Juice for Life (voted best vegetarian restaurant by Toronto Life) into a destination for many health-conscious celebrities. Fresh at Home is full of deliciously healthy recipes that will appeal to people of all tastes, whether vegetarian, vegan or neither. Brown and Houston reveal the secrets of customers' favourite dishes, including their divine Diva salad.

The Diva is a fabulous salad that sells out every time it is on special at Fresh. What makes it special is the combination of warm and crispy potato wedges, along with the cool green salad and creamy dressing. The capers add just the right amount of tartness to complement the creaminess of the dressing. It's best with a Yukon gold or red-skinned potato – and do leave the peel on.

THE DIVA

1 large potato, cut into 8 wedges
2 tbsp. olive oil
½ tsp. sea salt
6 cups mixed lettuce greens
2 tbsp. capers, drained
½ batch Creamy Dill Dressing
6 sun-dried tomatoes, sliced thinly
2 thin slices red onion
1 ripe avocado, sliced

Potatoes:

Bring a large pot of salted water to a boil. Put potato wedges in and cook until slightly softened, about 7-10 minutes. Drain and shake in the pan to roughen edges (which will help them to crisp later when you roast them). Let cool.

When you are ready to make the salad, brush the potato wedges with olive oil, sprinkle with salt and bake at 400. Turn wedges periodically and roast 10-15 minutes or until crisp.

Salad:

Toss lettuce greens and capers with dressing. Divide between two salad bowls. Top with sun-dried tomatoes, red

טרור מוסלמי

בתוך המים או מהמקפצה

כל ילד שנדל בישראל יודע שלהיות שייך למפלגה הנכונה פירושו משרות ממשלתיות, תמיכה כספית ושאר מנעמי השלטון. להיות מפאיניק בשנות החמישים זה כמו להיות ליכודניק עכשיו. אז מדוע נפל קיצפו של מבקר המדינה על צחי הנגבי, חשר לבטחון פנים בטענה שהביא למשרדו הקודם מאות חברי ליכוד ומשפחותיהם? מדוע נפתחה חקירה פלילית נגדו דווקא אם כולם עושים זאת? מסתבר שבבחירות האחרונות בליכוד השוויץ על כך תנגבי במסמכים ציבוריים. בדיעבד מסתבר שביקש שיחדיעו לו על כל משרה שמתפנה והוא הכניס "איש שלו" במקום כל אחד שעזב. על כך היטיב נחום ברנע לסתוב בידיעות אחרונות: ההבדל בין חנגבי וכל האחרים הוא שכולם מטילים את מימיהם במים, ואילו הוא עשה זאת מן המקפצה, שכולם יראו. אבל שישאר בינינו.

לאחרונה היינו בחתונתו של אריק ברגמן, רופא צעיר, בנם של אילנה ושמואל, עם בת"ל ג'ורדנה. לא הייתי טורח לספר לכם על אירוע פרטי שכזה אילולא עשה אריק מחווה שנעג לרבים מאיתנו במקום מרגש:

כנהוג בטורונטו נוהל התקס באנגלית, ובשפה זו גם הודה אריק לחבריו. ואז הוא פנה לאורחי החתונה באנגלית ואמר:" עכשיו הזמן להודות לחורי שאיתם אני מדבר רק בעברית ולא נראה לי שאני צריך לשנות את המנהג ח זה דווקא עכשיו." אריק התנצל בפני חקהל ועבר לעברית, והרבה עיניים נוצצות מדמעות היו באולם. היה משהו מאוד נאה במעשה הזה שהעיד על אריק, ויותר מזה על הוריו.

גמלים בוכים

onion and avocado. Arrange potato wedges vertically around edges of salad and serve. Serves 2.

CREAMY DILL DRESSING

This dressing is delicious on any salad, especially The Diva. You may need to add some water to get a nice consistency; this depends on the water content of the tofu you have. Stored in a sealed container in the fridge, it will last for up to 3 days.

¼ cup + 1 tbsp. olive oil
1 cooking onion, diced
3 cloves garlic
2 cups chopped firm tofu
1 tbsp. dried dillweed
¼ tsp. sea salt
1 tsp. Dijon mustard
¼ cup rice vinegar
filtered water (optional)

Heat 1 tbsp. oil in a skillet over medium heat. Sauté the onion and garlic for 5 minutes or until softened. Set aside and let cool.

Put onion/garlic mixture, remaining olive oil, tofu, dillweed, salt, mustard and vinegar in a blender and process until smooth. Add water if needed for a smooth consistency. Serves 4-6.

Ettie Shuken, a former artist and interior designer, is a Toronto-based food stylist for TV and print, teaches cooking classes featuring Sephardi cuisine and does recipe development. Shuken told me, "When my mom made this Greek spinach pie for her Ashkenazi friends in New Jersey many years ago, they thought it was very different. Now it has become mainstream.

"It can be prepared in advance and frozen, then baked when you need it. You can reheat it easily and it's an excellent do-ahead dish."

ETTIE SHUKEN'S SPANAKOPITA

Everyone loves spinach pie. There is no one correct recipe; some people like it with a lot of cheese, some prefer it with more spinach. Others vary the seasonings using mint or nutmeg instead of the dill. Some use grated cheeses instead of feta. Just watch the salt if the cheese is salty. Potato, farina or bread crumbs may also be added.

2 tbsp. olive oil or butter
1 small bunch green onions, trimmed and thinly sliced
2 pkgs. (10 oz. each) frozen chopped spinach, defrosted and squeezed dry
½ cup fresh parsley, chopped
½ cup fresh dill, chopped
8-10 oz. pressed cottage cheese or ricotta cheese
½ lb. feta cheese, crumbled
3-4 eggs, lightly beaten cream of wheat, if necessary
salt and pepper to taste
1 lb. phyllo dough (16-20 sheets)
1 cup butter, melted

Heat oil in a large pan and sauté green onions till soft. Add spinach, parsley and dill and cook gently for about 5 minutes. Place in a large bowl and cool. Add cheeses, eggs, salt and pepper. If filling looks too loose, sprinkle on some uncooked cream of wheat as a binder.

Line two 10-inch buttered pie pans with filo dough, using 4 sheets of filo for each pan; brush each sheet of filo lightly with butter. Divide the filling evenly between the pans. Smooth tops. Cover filling using another 4-5 sheets of buttered filo for each pan. Roll the ends of the dough to seal the edges. Butter the tops of each pie. Score tops with a sharp knife to allow the steam to escape.

Bake pies in a preheated oven at 350 for 45-60 minutes, until puffed and golden brown.

Note: To make triangles, assemble as directed below. The triangles may be made and frozen unbaked. Bake the frozen triangles on a buttered cookie sheet until golden brown, about 20-25 minutes. If making these ahead of time, bake them, then refrigerate and reheat before serving.

To Assemble Triangles (Trigonas):

Stack filo, covering it with a large piece of foil to prevent it from drying out. Use 1 sheet at a time and keep the rest covered. Brush filo with melted butter, 1 sheet at a time. You do not have to cover every spot with butter.

Stack 3 layers of filo and cut into seven strips across the long side. Place 1 tsp. of filling 1 inch from the end nearest you. Bring the bottom edge over filling so that it meets the left edge forming a right angle. Continue folding up as you would a flag.

Butter the tops and place on a greased baking sheet. Bake at 350 for 20-25 minutes, until golden brown and puffed.

Iran may have A-bomb capability next year: Israel

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel's chief of military intelligence said in remarks broadcast Monday that if Iran's atomic program is allowed to continue, Tehran will have the capability of independently developing nuclear weapons by early next year.

In a Sunday speech to the Israel-Jordan Chamber of Commerce, MI chief Aharon Ze'evi-Farkash said, "If the processes continue as we are currently seeing them, the coming half year with respect to Iran will determine if Iran will achieve, in the spring of 2005, a non-conventional capability in the sphere of nuclear research and development; that is, it will no longer require external aid to reach an unconventional capability.

"This does not mean that it will have a bomb in 2005. It means that it will have all the means at its disposal to build a bomb."

If Iran is not stopped, apparently by international efforts, he continued, "this may drag the region into a nuclear domino effect."

While the board of directors of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) meets this week, the United States is trying to round up a two-thirds majority to issue an ultimatum to Iran, the next step before the issue of Iran's nuclear weapons program reaches the UN Security Council.

The Security Council could impose sanctions on Iran due to violations of agreements regarding the inspection of its nuclear program, and its secret efforts to enrich uranium, which is necessary for the creation of nuclear bombs.

Ultimatum will be revised before being formally submitted to the IAEA Board of Governors

Undersecretary of State John Bolton was in Israel Sunday on his way to the IAEA meeting in Vienna. He met with Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom and Gideon Frank, the director-general of the Israel Atomic Energy Commission.

Bolton said Russia and the Europeans, particularly Britain, France and Germany, all with relatively close ties to Iran, play a key role in international pressure applied on Iran, and the "European troika" has indicated supporting the ultimatum. The three countries are proposing that a final ultimatum be issued now, demanding full co-operation with the IAEA, rather than waiting until November.

The European Union's "big three" states – France, Britain and Germany – have circulated a draft resolution ahead of the IAEA meeting on Iran's nuclear program that falls short of reporting Tehran to the UN Security Council, as Washington would have liked.

The draft text will be revised before being formally submitted to the IAEA Board of Governors, but western diplomats from some of the 35 board member states said the United States has little support for tough action against Iran now.

The text calls on Iran to dispel worries that it has a nuclear weapons program by November, at which time the board will "probably" consider whether any "further steps" are needed.

One western diplomat said the vague wording did not lock the board into any particular course of action.

"It includes several possibilities. One is a report to the Security Council, which may or may not lead to economic sanctions," the diplomat said. "Another is that the board might choose to drop Iran from its agenda altogether. Or the IAEA just continues with Iran the way it's been going until now."

The IAEA has been investigating Iran's nuclear program for two years, ever since the National Council of Resistance of Iran (NCRI) reported in August 2002 that Tehran was concealing several massive nuclear facilities from the UN watchdog.

It has uncovered many potentially weapons-related activities but has found nothing to confirm U.S. allegations that Iranian has a secret nuclear bomb program.

Iran insists its atomic program is entirely peaceful and aimed solely at generating electricity.

European marksmen-for-hire in Gaza

DEBKAfile Exclusive Report

The two Palestinians talked as they walked near the sandbanks until they reached a point 500 metres from his perch atop an Israel Defence Forces position. They then turned back and disappeared behind Palestinian houses.

M. decided this break in Palestinian routine was worth reporting to his superior officer. After making the report, he put the incident out of his mind.

About 90 minutes later, he stood up to move to another part of the roof. His right shoulder had been visible over the parapet for no more than three or four seconds when he was knocked over by a gunshot before he had time to fire. Another soldier on the roof shot back at once, but the sniper was gone.

In the hospital, M. was shown the bullet extracted from his shoulder. It came from an M16 automatic rifle and had been fired from a distance of 500 metres, exactly the point where the two Palestinians had turned back from the sandbank opposite M.'s rooftop sights. His comrade told him he had caught a glimpse of the shooter he missed and was sure he was European.

"A sniper fast enough to lock onto my shoulder, shoot and disappear – all in the space of three or four seconds – must be a top-line professional marksman," M said.

His account has been repeated by members of other units serving in the Rafah and Khan Younis sectors of the southern Gaza Strip. They swear they have come across snipers they are sure are not Palestinian, but rather foreigners from Europe.

DEBKAfile's military sources report that in 2003, the IDF confirmed four instances of "foreign" snipers operating in Palestinian ranks. By September, five incidents had been registered this year. In one, an Israeli soldier died of a direct shot to the head. Four were injured in Operation Rainbow in Rafah earlier this year, and recently there were two more injuries.

Comment

Soldiers serving in the southern sector claim the number of casualties from European snipers is much higher, and they are asking questions. Their officers reply that the matter is extremely sensitive but urge them to take precautions on the assumption that professional marksmen are in the vicinity.

Some troops say they have heard the special bang peculiar to the Russian-made SVD sharpshooter rifle, of the type captured aboard the Palestinian smugglers' ship Karin-A and found during Operation Rainbow. The troops who have come up against these foreigners note their exceptional speed. They fire a single round and duck out of sight, leaving a Palestinian to take over their firing position.

This description, DEBKAfile's military sources say, fits mercenary marksmen. By firing once and moving out, they save themselves from Israeli sniper reprisals. As one Israeli officer put it, "After all they're in it for the money, not to get killed."

For the same reason, they never stay long in the Gaza Strip – a couple of days and they are gone back across the border into Egypt. It is believed that some of them enter through the Palestinian gun-running tunnels from Sinai to Rafah and leave by the same route. Others may be smuggled in from Sinai to southern Israel in groups of illegal workers and prostitutes. The smugglers are said to receive extra-high pay, as much as $1,000 US, for bringing a foreign marksman in and out of the Gaza Strip.

Palestinian terrorist chiefs have been importing marksmen for hire to hit Israeli troops for two or more years. In March 2002, the London Daily Telegraph, known for its good British Ministry of Defence and intelligence sources, reported a request from the Israeli Mossad to British intelligence to find out if an IRA sharpshooter had not been responsible for the seven Israeli troop deaths at the Wadi Harmiya checkpoint. Israeli tests had shown that the planning of the ambush, the type of weapons used, the way the firefight was managed and, even more tellingly, the fact that the weapons left behind were not the ones used in the attack, were typical of an assailant thoroughly conversant with IRA tactics.

A month later, when Moshav Adura was stormed by Palestinian gunmen, Israeli civilians who had seen the terrorists at close quarters reported that among the Palestinians was a European.

Netanyahu calls for referendum; Israelis rally against Gaza plan

JTA and Ha'retz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — In a surprise move seen as lending indirect backing to right-wing opponents of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's Gaza disengagement plan, Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu Monday called for a nationwide referendum on the initiative.

In Netanyahu's view, the referendum should be held as soon as possible, with the run-up to voting taking no more than six weeks, Israel Radio reported.

Netanyahu, speaking to a ceremony marking the upcoming Rosh Hashanah holiday, told treasury employees and invited journalists: "I am very concerned by what all of us are seeing and have experienced in recent weeks, the verbal blows and emotions ahead of the decisions over the disengagement.

"I propose, not as a condition but as a step that could help safeguard the unity of the people, bringing about an accelerated process of a referendum, posing one question: 'Are you in favour or against the government's decision on a phased disengagement?'"

Netanyahu's call came after a rally Sunday night in Jerusalem against Sharon and his disengagement plan.

Smarting from Sharon's warnings that his harsher pro-settler critics could spark civil war, protest organizers tore down one banner labelling the prime minister a traitor.

But elsewhere in the crowd of tens of thousands, another sign showing a grinning Sharon under the title "dictator" remained aloft and undisturbed.

The message was that Sharon, not the demonstrators, was defying democracy and inviting violence with his plan to withdraw from Gaza and four settlements in the West Bank next year.

"If the government does not put the decision to a referendum, or new elections, some sectors of the public could interpret it as an illegitimate decision," said Hasdai Eliezer, the mayor of Alfei Menashe in the West Bank.

"That is liable to bring the situation to a boiling point which we, as the settler leadership, fear."

Such conciliatory talk was a far cry from recent calls by other settler leaders for violent resistance against the evacuation of the Gaza Strip and parts of the West Bank, under Sharon's plan to "disengage" from conflict with the Palestinians in 2005.

"These are calls that amount to civil war," Sharon told his Cabinet on Sunday.

Later, the prime minister directed his admonitions to rebellious members of the ruling Likud Party.

"Disputes are legitimate," Sharon told Likud faithful at a Tel Aviv toast ahead of Rosh Hashanah. "But when the situation reaches the point of incitement and hatefulness, this cannot be, because our plans will be implemented," he said, adding that "This can be done in good spirits, or it can be done amid tough and baseless struggles."

Anti-disengagement activists accuse Sharon of reneging on previous pledges not to make concessions on the biblical Land of Israel.

But with polls showing most Israelis – including some settlers – back withdrawals from Gaza and the West Bank, Sharon has been unfazed by shows of oppositions such as Sunday's rally.

Channel Two television reported Sunday that the government would pay the first instalment of relocation packages to settlers who move voluntarily after Rosh Hashanah.

But as the 1995 assassination of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin showed, it only takes one extremist to change the course of Israeli history.

In the weeks prior to his gunning-down, Rabin was lambasted in right-wing rallies as a "traitor."

Although that word was not mentioned at Sunday's demonstration, the government was not taking any chances.

Sharon, who has had his personal security boosted, ordered the Shin Bet to step up surveillance on far-right groups.

That might be upgraded to "administrative detention" – the open-ended holding in custody of suspected terrorists – if the assassination threat grows.

"I hope we will not have to resort" to administrative detention "against settlers or against religious leaders," Justice Minister Yosef 'Tommy' Lapid told reporters. "But we are reserving our right to do so if necessary."

Demonstrators scream their disapproval of the policies of the Sharon government. The poster refers to Sharon as a dictator who shows contempt. [Israel photo]

Legal system will step in Justice Minister Yosef Lapid criticized a call for forceful opposition to the evacuation of settlements under Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's disengagement plan as "incitement to civil war," saying it posed a threat to the rule of law and the well-being of the state. "It is untenable that there is incitement to civil war in the name of love for the country," said Lapid, warning that the legal system would not remain indifferent in the face of incitement that could pose a tangible danger, and which contained the threat of force against sections of the defence establishment. Lapid was responding to the statement made to Minister of Defence Shaul Mofaz by certain communal leaders in the Gaza that they will "repel IDF soldiers from our communities."

Israel strikes Hamas camp

Israeli forces killed 14 Palestinians at a Hamas training camp in Gaza. Tanks and helicopter gunships shelled a soccer field in the town of Sijaya before dawn last Tuesday, also wounding at least two dozen terrorists who were undergoing training. Israeli security sources described the strike as retaliation for a double suicide bombing by Hamas that killed 16 people in Be'er Sheva last week. "We will strike against Hamas wherever we can find it," said a spokesman for Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

Satellite crash probed

Israeli officials ordered an investigation after the crash of a spy satellite intended to increase surveillance over Iran. A Knesset subcommittee dealing with intelligence and security assessments will urgently meet to discuss the implications of the failed launch of the Ofek-6 satellite on Israel's security, Army Radio reported last week. The Ofek-6 crashed in the Mediterranean Sea shortly after takeoff due to a rocket malfunction.

'Israel not spying on U.S.'

Ariel Sharon denied that Israel is spying on the United States. The Israeli prime minister's comments came after reports that the FBI is probing the alleged leak of classified Pentagon material that may have ended up in Israeli hands. "Israel is not conducting any espionage activity whatsoever in the United States," Sharon told the Jerusalem Post.

Sharon rebuffs Syrian offer

Ariel Sharon said Israel would not resume peace talks with Syria until it stops sponsoring terrorism. In a newspaper interview, the Israeli prime minister said Syrian President Bashar Assad's offers to resume negotiations that stalled in 2000 were merely a bid to win over American public opinion. "The call for negotiations [must] be accompanied by action," Sharon told the Jerusalem Post.

Horovitz new editor of Jerusalem Post

David Horovitz will replace Bret Stephens as editor-in-chief of The Jerusalem Post on Oct. 1, the Post announced last week. Horovitz, 42, is currently editor-in-chief of The Jerusalem Report.

Auto deaths

Magen David Adom reported last week that 372 people have been killed on Israel's highways this year.

Migration alters Jewish map of Europe

By ELIAHU SALPETER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The Jewish map of Europe is in transition, and a combination of decline and renewal of Jewish centres is conspicuous in three places – France, Germany and the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS).

Analysis

In France, the home of the largest Jewish community in Europe, the last five years have witnessed a dramatic rise in anti-Semitic incidents: from nine in 1999 to 230 in the first eight months of this year, or an annual projection of 350. For the first time since the end of Occupied France, Jews are again living in fear for their personal safety, which has prompted many to remove their skullcaps and Star of David pendants.

The French government still prefers to speak in general terms of "hooliganism," but, in effect, it is finally admitting that the "hooligans" are almost always young Muslims and their victims, Jews. Even though the authorities still mention (not without justification) the failure of the absorption of North African immigrants into French society, it is no longer an unforgivable sin to say that the French are not solely to blame.

Everyone basically understands that there is ethnic hostility toward the Jews that stems not only from the unemployment, poor living conditions and family problems of the North African immigrants, but rather from a hatred whose roots are in the Middle East conflict.

For the first time since the Nazi era, Jews in a democratic European state view emigration as the answer to their fears and their children's future. Very quietly, the French government is beginning to recognize the new reality, if not the true nature of the threat. And even the Israeli government is beginning to admit that the confrontation with the Palestinians is affecting the security of Diaspora Jewry.

The French government is sensitive to the electoral strength of the millions of Muslim voters, but the French security services are among the most diligent in the war against Muslim violence and terror. It is too early to speak of a change in the climate, but there are probably signs of it in Paris.

It is also too early to foresee the effect of the kidnapping of two French journalists in Iraq. Will more Muslims in France join those demanding their release, or will there be a renewal of the traditional hostility toward Arabs? What is already clear to many French is that the country's pro-Arab policy does not guarantee them immunity from Arab terror. And France presumably will not be immune to internal criticism of allowing continued immigration to Europe.

Germany is experiencing far-reaching change in its Jewish community. Here, too, the cause is mass immigration – this time of Jews from the CIS. Germany granted Jews from the former Soviet Union the right to immigrate to Germany, and as a result, for the first time since the Holocaust, Germany has a large Jewish population of some 120,000. The immigrants brought their own cultural traditions and social values, which are just as strong as the values of their new country.

For 200 years before Hitler's rise to power, Germany attracted intellectuals and Jewish merchants from Russia. They trickled in, longing to absorb German culture. Now, the new immigrants are holding on to their ways. Paradoxically, many of them will actually have to learn their Judaism.

The greatest change of all is happening among Jews in the CIS. This is due, in large part, to something that is usually considered negative: people leaving Israel.

More than a million Jews immigrated to Israel from the Soviet Union, and later, from the CIS. Most came after the disintegration of the Soviet regime. But, at the same time, a reverse movement began: a return to the CIS from Israel.

Returnees to their country of origin are a common phenomenon in any mass emigration during the modern era. Before World War II, during the years of the great migrations, close to half the émigrés went back to their homelands, including Jews who returned to eastern Europe from America, with American passports in their pockets.

Over the past decade, Jews have begun to return to the CIS, while holding on to their Israeli citizenship. At first this was a kind of "insurance policy" that also made it easier to visit relatives back in Israel, but it soon turned out that the returnees brought with them not only Israeli passports, but also an Israeli spiritual and cultural awareness.

For the hundreds of thousands of Jews who remained in Russia, Ukraine, Belarus and other states, the returning émigrés are representatives of Israel and Zionism. More than a few say that in Israel they were considered "Russians," and they now feel and are viewed as Israeli.

They want Jewish educations for their children (provided mainly by some 150 schools run by the Chabad movement), who are joined by children who have never visited Israel. An estimated one-third of the students in these schools are the children of returnees from Israel, while two-thirds are locals.

The Israelis join the local Jewish community that is being rehabilitated – or started from scratch – and take an active part in community activities. Many returnees earn a living from their Israeli experience, working as teachers in the Jewish schools, as employees of the Jewish communities and organizations and even as substitute clergymen when necessary.

They listen to Voice of Israel broadcasts, receive Israeli newspapers from their relatives and visit Israel often. Anyone passing through Ben-Gurion Airport will find it hard to believe the many flights leaving Tel Aviv for Moscow, St. Petersburg, Kiev and dozens of other cities in the CIS. Former Israelis have also become an important factor in the promotion of trade between Israel and the CIS.

It is too early to tell what their children will do when they grow up – whether they will leave for Israel or remain in the CIS. One thing, however, is certain: the returnees, just like the mass immigration to Israel a decade ago, are helping to save the Jews of the CIS from total assimilation.

Computer technology comes to aid of ALS patients

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Amyotrophic lateral sclerosis (ALS) has been described by some as an illness in which the mind is trapped in the body.

Often called Lou Gehrig's Disease in memory of the New York Yankees star of the 1920s and '30s who died of the disease, ALS is a progressive, fatal neurodegenerative disease that attacks the neurons in the brain and spinal cord that control the movement of the voluntary muscles.

When the neurons can no longer send impulses to the muscles, the muscles atrophy and eventually become immobile. There is a loss of control of the hands, arms and legs, slurred speech and eventually, difficulty in swallowing and breathing. Intellectual abilities, vision and hearing are not affected.

The late Toronto Sun columnist Jerry Gladman, a victim of ALS, wrote feelingly about his dog's bewilderment when he was no longer able to pat him, stroke him or even talk to him. Not to mention his own devastation with that.

Today there is computer technology that can improve the quality of life of people with ALS. A prime but rare example is the Assistive Technology Clinic (ATC), called the Reuben Kunin ALS Technology Clinic. Located at Sunnybrook and Women's Health Sciences Centre's Bayview site, the clinic is in peril of having to close, and not through any fault of the program or the staff.

While the ATC is located on the hospital's Bayview campus, it is not a part of Sunnybrook, but operates as an independent contractor. And its funding is about to be withdrawn. A founding grant from the ALS Society of Toronto was not renewed in March, and the support of the Kunin-Lunenfeld Foundation that gives the clinic its name is being withdrawn this month.

ATC clinical and managing director Pearl Gryfe founded the program 10 years ago. She said she felt "those who lose the ability to move, speak, eat and breathe except by artificial means need more than power wheelchairs.

"They need the means to communicate – they need a quality of life."

She reasoned that if modern technology could put a man on the moon, it could certainly do better for these people.

Gryfe called IBM and Apple, and asked for help. On her own time, she worked with their technical staff to produce the remarkable systems that ATC uses.

As ATC's reputation grew, referrals began to come from all over the province. In fact, Gryfe said, one-third of the clinic's clients are from outside Toronto.

The technology that has been developed and is available on loan to those with ALS includes an environmental computer that can control any function in the house with just a touch, or even the blink of an eye, depending on what physical skills the patient has retained.

Other computer softwares available allows many activities to be carried out using voice recognition, including playing games, finding recipes and doing accounts and e-mail. Some activities can be done via an infra-red button on a cap or on glasses.

Doors can be opened or shut, alarms can be activated or turned off and lights can be adjusted. The person can answer the phone or initiate phone calls.

The treatment and support team consists of occupational, communication disorder and speech therapists, as well as nurses, social service staff, technologists and physicians from all disciplines.

Needless to say, all this requires money – which is in short supply.

"We have published research about the impact of our work on people's lives. No one disputes the value of what we do. But no one wants to do anything about it," said Gryfe.

Since the funding has been cut off, she said, she has had to lay off a staff member, and restructure the program.

ATC has been forced to charge for its services. Many, she said, can't afford it. "They wait too long to come here, and then it is much harder for us to intervene to help them. It's heartbreaking."

In addition to working with ALS patients, the Assistive Technology Clinic also works with people with multiple sclerosis (through the Elkie Adler Program for Multiple Sclerosis), muscular dystrophy, stroke, traumatic injury and Parkinson's disease. Nevertheless, The Reuben Kunin Technology program for Amyotrophic Lateral Sclerosis is among the only ones of its kind in the world.

The situation is, as Gryfe said, "heartbreaking."

Kost was part of a team of researchers from BGU and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) that jointly developed the SonoPrep. It applies the ultrasound waves to the skin for 15 seconds, disrupting a protective membrane to allow larger molecules, including those of many drugs, to pass through quickly. It has been approved by the U. S. Food and Drug Administration and went on sale this month for $2,000 (US). [Israpet photo]

Neshama Carlebach embarks on a journey of discovery and emotion

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

In many ways, Neshama Carlebach's art has imitated her life, which has been filled with journeys of discovery and emotion.

The singer, songwriter and performer has used her varied experiences as inspiration for her new CD Journey, her fifth disc in a decade.

Carlebach, the daughter of the late folk singer Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach, says the record's title and its songs reflect new phases in her life: she married last year, has taken up yoga, and is finding a "new connection" to her voice through vocal therapist Simeon Blitman.

"I feel like I'm really grounded on this earth. It's one of those breakthrough times," she says.

Neshama Carlebach

She credits her recent marriage with inspiring her to make a livelier disc than the previous ones.

"Meeting my bashert [soulmate] changed me. All sorts of amazing self-discovery happened. It's nothing that I could have predicted or felt. Everything in that sense just fell into place," the 29-year-old says. "There's more joy and celebration in this record. It's more natural and spontaneous, which is really what life's journey is like – not to prejudge yourself and be who you are."

She describes Journey as, "Earthy, and very much an emotional exploration. What came out was real and beautiful."

The Jewish-themed songs were recorded in a single take, "unplugged" with no electric instruments – unlike her other studio albums.

Carlebach is following in the musical footsteps of her father, the famed folk singer and spiritual leader who wrote thousands of Jewish melodies, many of which are still sung in synagogues throughout the world.

When she was five, Neshama began training as a singer and an actor, and started singing with her father when she was 15. In 1994, two weeks before he died at age 69, they finished recording an album together.

"Never in my lifetime did I imagine that I was developing the strength, knowledge and skill to follow in his footsteps," she says.

"When I started to compose I discovered that by singing I was not only continuing in my father's way but was accomplishing my own life's work as well."

Though she grew up in Toronto, her home for the past five years has been New York City, where she was born. "My father's shul is here and New York is absolutely my favourite place," she says. Her sister, Dari, shot the CD's cover photo of Carlebach in Central Park.

She says she is looking forward to performing the new songs, and already has concerts lined up in Israel, Europe and South Africa.

Carlebach's philosophy on getting into the right groove for a performance is simple and intuitive. She feels that over-analyzing can hamper her singing.

"When you're in the moment, you're not supposed to be thinking at all. Conscious practice leads to unconscious habit."

She already has plans for the next disc, a record of mainstream pop.

"It's time I got my music out to the rest of the world, not just the Jewish world," she says.

For months, she has also been hard at work on a Broadway musical about her father's life, due to premiere in January on what what would have been his 80th birthday.

"It's an inspiring project," she says.

Carlebach has a background in theater, having studied drama at Toronto's Ryerson University before earning a degree in humanities at York University. She aspired to be a Broadway actress before taking on a music career. Segments of the play will be previewed in New York on Oct. 30, to coincide with her father's 10th yahrzeit.

"I pray that people find hope in my father's music. I hope it makes them feel something greater than them," she says. "I feel very much this is another step in my journey."

Three movies added to VSC catalogue

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

In the past I have written about Video Service Corporation, a Canadian company that carries a number of Jewish and Israeli titles distributed by Sisu Entertainment in the United States. These videos can be purchased here in Canada by any video retailer or directly from VSC.

This month, three new titles have been added to the VSC catalogue. They include the Holocaust film, The 17th Bride, the Israeli screwball comedy Halfon Hill Doesn't Answer, and the Israeli film Fictitious Marriage.

The 17th Bride is set in a war ravaged village in Czechoslovakia in 1942. The Nazis order all unmarried Jewish women to be shipped to labour camps. A number of the women quickly arrange to get married, including the one who is the central focus of this story.

She is the 17th woman to get married that day and she does this although she dislikes her husband and is only doing it to save herself from deportation.

The film stars Lisa Hartman and Rosemary Leach and was filmed in English. It is based on a book written by Ladislav Grosman, who also wrote The Shop On Main Street.

Halfon Hill Doesn't Answer is an insane 1975 comedy dealing with three reservists in the Israeli army who can't seem to stay out of trouble. It features the comedy trio Hagashash and was written and directed by Assi Dayan.

Fictitious Marriage is a dark comedy from 1988 about a quiet Israeli high school teacher who prepares to visit New York but is detoured by a midlife crisis. Instead of going to the airport, he checks into a Tel Aviv hotel where he is mistaken for an Arab labourer and winds up getting into a fictitious marriage with the clerk at the hotel where he is staying.

Halfon Hill and Fictitious Marriage are in Hebrew with optional English subtitles.

All of these films may be ordered through your local video store or you may obtain them by calling Video Service Corporation at (416) 597-8325 or 1-877-341-7577 or by e-mailing the company at vidserv@globalserve.net.

ISRAELI TOURISM FIGURES CONTINUE TO CLIMB AS OFFICIALS LAUNCH HIGH HOLY DAY CAMPAIGN

After last year's "Israel. I Care. And I'm Going" pledge campaign helped draw more North American Jews to Israel than in any previous year, Israeli tourism officials are keen to build on that success with a similar community outreach strategy tied to the High Holy Days.

Last year, some 1,246 synagogues in six Canadian provinces and 44 American states participated in the pledge campaign, many by distributing pledge cards in their synagogues during the High Holy Days, asking recipients to commit to visiting Israel in the coming year.

Once again, Israeli tourism officials are distributing "Save the Date" cards to synagogue congregants across North America. The aim is to attract an unprecedented 1.4 million visitors during 2004.

"You make all the difference in the world when you make a concrete decision to visit Israel," said Dani Shahal, Israel's tourism consul in Canada. "By visiting, you strengthen morale, contribute to the economy, and show your support for the continuity of Israel. Sit down with your family, your rabbi, your congregation, and plan a trip of a lifetime, a trip you will never forget."

According to Shahal, more Jews from North America visited Israel during 2003 than in any previous year, a sure sign that tourism is stronger than ever. The number of Canadian youth traveling to Israel is also up: so far, 3,478 have visited Israel this year as part of the Birthright program.

Through July of this year, Israel has welcomed 821,800 tourists, a 58-per-cent increase over last year's figures for the same time period.

To participate in the "Israel. I Care. And I'm Going" campaign, visit www.goisrael. com/savethedate. Or contact the Israel Government Tourist Office, 416-964-3784, e-mail, info@igto.ca.

20th Century's Most Brilliant Scientist: "Einstein," the most comprehensive exhibition ever mounted on the life and theories of Albert Einstein (1879-1955), opens this week at Los Angeles's Skirball Cultural Centre, and runs until May 29, 2005. (It has already been shown in New York, Boston and Chicago, and goes on view in Jerusalem in Sept. 2005.)

The exhibition, which was organized by the American Museum of Natural History, the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and the Skirball Centre offers rare glimpses of many scientific manuscripts, original correspondence and other treasures from the Albert Einstein Archives at the Hebrew University, which is the permanent home of Einstein's intellectual legacy. Most of the items have not traveled outside Israel since their arrival and have never been exhibited to the public before the traveling exhibit arrived in America in 1992.

The show will become especially newsworthy in 2005, the 100th anniversary of the great scientist's "miracle year" of 1905, when he proved the existence and sizes of molecules, explained light as both particles and waves, and created the special theory of relativity.

"This exhibition helps people from all ages and walks of life to see how Einstein's understanding of nature and humankind influenced his science and, in turn, how his science changed our world and touches our lives every day," said Skirball president Uri Herscher. "It's a chance to celebrate the lasting impact of one person's monumental achievement, while also exploring his humanity."

Private shows a non-political viewpoint to intifadah

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Saverio Costanzo's Private, which was screened at the Toronto International Film Festival last week, delves into the current Palestinian uprising without getting bogged down in its implicitly explosive political issues.

The film, which unfolds in Arabic, Hebrew and English, is set somewhere in the West Bank during an Israeli army operation to flush out terrorists.

At the heart of it is a prosperous middle-class Palestinian family caught up in the spiral of violence.

Without warning, an Israeli patrol bursts into their spacious home. The intrusion touches off a family debate turning on the efficacy of resistance to Israel's occupation.

Although the movie is filtered through the eyes of the Palestinians under siege, Costanzo resists the temptation to demonize the Israeli soldiers.

Private, which uses Israeli Arab and Jewish performers, clearly tries to strike a fine balance between decrying the occupation and presenting the Israelis as ordinary human beings.

The opening scene establishes its tone and parameters.

Mohammed (Mohammed Bakri), a quiet secondary school principal, is discussing a matter of some importance with his vocal wife, Samiah (Areen Omari).

Having grown weary of the intifadah, she wants to leave the West Bank, if only for the sake of their adolescent children.

On principle, Mohammed refuses, saying he does not wish to be a refugee. "To be or not to be," he intones solemnly, appropriating a line from Shakespeare.

Shortly afterward, the Israelis break into their home and pandemonium ensues.

The hard-driving Israeli commander, Ofer (Lior Miller), wants to use the building as an observation post, and asks the family to vacate it. When Mohammed declines, Ofer unilaterally divides the house into three distinct areas, one of which is strictly off limits to the family.

As tensions rise, the night air crackles with the sound of gunfire.

At its core, Private, which is based on a true story, is about the opposing points of view the family adopts as it faces this unexpected crisis.

Mohammed, who seems to be a pacifist, believes that a co-operative spirit and a business-as-usual attitude will tide them over. But his rebellious older daughter, Mariam (Hend Ayoub), wants "to fight fire with fire."

Private, which was filmed in Italy, takes a drastic turn when Ofer, a hot-headed officer, holds a revolver to Mohammed's head in a futile attempt to force him off his property.

At the heart of Private is a Palestinian family caught up in the spiral of violence.

As he points his gun at Mohammed, one of the soldiers protests, highlighting the differences in their respective approach to the Palestinians.

Could this scene be a microcosm of the larger debate about the Arab-Israeli dispute that roils Israel?

Mariam's discovery that the Israeli soldiers are humans rather than stereotypical ogres is perhaps the most interesting dimension of Private.

Sneaking up to the forbidden second floor area, she watches an Israeli play a flute and, later, a group of Israelis cheering on their soccer team during a televised game.

Mariam's indirect exposure to the Israelis leads her to the belated realization that simplistic explanations about them will no longer suffice.

Indeed, these scenes of a shared humanity are what elevate Private to a higher artistic level.

In the waning monents, Costanzo underlines this theme.

"Hi," Mohammed greets Ofer in a friendly greeting. "Shalom," Ofer responds in a reciprocal gesture.

Israelis and Palestinians are far apart in terms of politics and culture. But, as Costanzo seems to suggest, hope springs eternal.

This is Private's enduring and hopeful message.

TEATRON PRESENTS TWO WORKS OF PROVEN MERIT

Teatron, a Toronto theatre company that presents Jewish-themed plays, has announced a new subscription series consisting of two theatrical works of proven merit and popularity.

Thanks to Teatron, which is the brainchild of theatrical director Ari Weisberg, the Toronto premier of The Chosen, by Aaron Posner and Chaim Potok, takes place Nov. 27 to Dec. 12 at the Leah Posluns Studio Theatre, Koffler Centre. The play is an adaptation of Potok's award-winning, best-selling novel about two boys, two fathers and two very different Jewish communities – five blocks and a world apart.

Teatron's second production, presented in association with Amicus Production, is The Sisters Rosensweig, by Wendy Wasserstein. The play is a comedy about three very different Jewish sisters and their get-together for the eldest's 54th birthday. It runs March 10 to 19, 2005 at the Fairview Library Theatre.

Both works are being directed by Weisberg, who said they have "filled theatres wherever they were presented" and "will provoke, surprise and make the audience laugh."

Teatron continues its popular "After the Show" discussions with the cast and the director on Thursday nights. Subscription prices range from $42 to $32. 416-781-5527, e-mail theatron@sympatico.ca.

Sutton Group Admiral's sales force continues spectacular growth

In the past two years, this "little company that grew" has seen its sales force continue to swell, to over 190 salespeople and counting! Now in its 12th year, the firm continues to be a magnet for top agents looking to increase their bottom line. With maximum opportunity and minimum hassle, it's not hard to see why.

Murray Goldkind

Toronto real estate Brokers Sol & Murray Goldkind now spend much of their time interviewing these prospective new team members.

"What an agent really wants most is to affiliate with the right company and sell as much real estate as they can with the fewest headaches possible. Every top agent we talk to is interested in one thing: making more money. But they also want their independence," says Murray.

According to the Goldkinds, top agents are now looking for service-oriented environments without the rigid structure of yesteryear — exactly the kind of productive atmosphere the Goldkinds see themselves providing.

Many agents like the idea of being productive without having to be in the office every day. When they are in the office, agents with Sutton Group Admiral all have access to the latest computer facilities, and enjoy full use of the latest in personal marketing and career management software. Sutton Group Admiral uses a "fee-for-service" concept,

"Fee for services" concept which lets agents pick and choose the services they want. In this way there are never any hidden costs passed on to an agent, nor are agents ever penalized by waste generated by others. In other words, each agent, acting as his or her own businessperson, enjoys the benefit of controlling their income and their expenses. "In the old days, top agents concentrated nearly exclusively on their income, but today the smart agents are looking just as strongly at their bottom line," says Murray.

The Sutton Group Admiral advantage offers a serious real estate agent the best of all worlds. More money in their pocket, freedom to operate at their own level, flexibility in business planning, and access to tools and services. Says Sol, "timing isn't everything, it's just 98%, and as timing goes we are comfortable that we have the concept agents are looking for both now and in the future."

Sol Goldkind

The agents and brokers of Sutton Group Admiral Realty wish you a Happy, Healthy & Peaceful New Year

Survivors:
Collection of short stories by Chava Rosenfarb

Yiddish writer has a classical, almost Tolstoyan touch

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Chava Rosenfarb, the celebrated Yiddish writer who has lived in Canada for more than half a century, has finally seen one of her books get published in her adoptive homeland.

With the publication of Survivors, a collection of seven short stories about Holocaust survivors, Toronto-based Cormorant Books is the first Canadian publishing house to produce a book by the Lodz-born writer, whose many awards have included the prestigious Itsik Manger Prize in 1979 and the Shalom Aleichem Prize in 1990.

Rosenfarb's two novels, Bociany and Of Lodz and Love, brought her a rush of acclaim five years ago when the American scholarly house Syracuse University Press presented them simultaneously in English translation.

As added proof that the English-speaking world has discovered Chava Rosenfarb, the University of Wisconsin is preparing a new English edition of her huge master work, The Tree of Life, for release later this year. Published originally in Yiddish in three volumes as Der Boym Fun Leib in 1972, the book was printed in English only once before, in Australia in 1985.

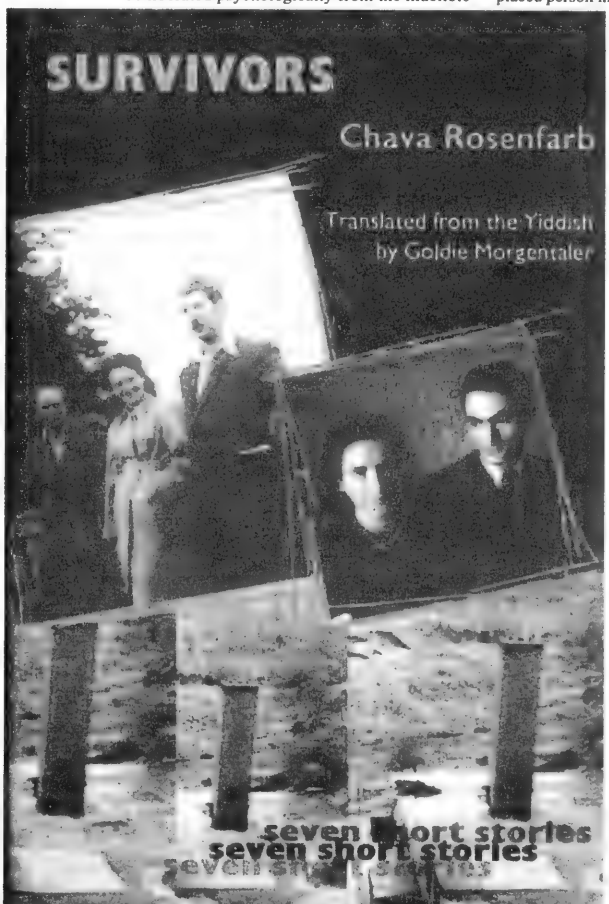
Rosenfarb, who is also preparing an English edition of her novel Briv Tsu Abrashen (Letters to Abrasha), is clearly delighted to see more and more of her work available to English readers. She speaks English fluently but with an accent, and still writes her fiction in Yiddish first.

"Yiddish is sort of the basis for me," she said during a recent interview in Toronto. "If I want to write about Yiddish-speaking Jews, it's the best way to do it, to write in Yiddish and then translate. Although it's a tremendous amount of work! I could have written new books."

While Rosenfarb often does many of her own translations, her daughter, Goldie Morgentaler, an associate professor of English at the University of Lethbridge, translated all the stories in Survivors.

An obvious theme runs through all of Rosenfarb's novels. A survivor of the Lodz ghetto as well as of Auschwitz and Bergen-Belsen, she emerged determined to chronicle the Jewish life in Lodz before and during the Nazi devastation. Her books Bociany and Of Lodz and Love are prewar preludes to The Tree of Life, which follows 10 characters from 1939 through the liquidation of the ghetto in 1944.

In the stories in Survivors, Rosenfarb studies the afterlife of the tiny demographic subset of European Jews who survived Hitler; and observes that while most are successful in building new lives for themselves on new continents, they can never be liberated psychologically from the indelible horrors they have experienced.



Rosenfarb is an expert storyteller with a classical, almost Tolstoyan touch, as evidenced even in the opening piece, The Greenhorn. An engaging sketch, it highlights the ironic differences between the idyllic romantic vision many Canadians may have harboured of Europe versus the tortuous realities that continued to burn in survivors' memories after the war.

In Last Love, a terminally-ill survivor returns to Paris and persuades her husband to arrange a young lover for her to enjoy once before she dies. She dies in the young man's arms, forever transforming his youthful innocence.

As we know, and as these stories show, life for the liberated is nothing like a bed of roses, except perhaps as regards the thorns. Edgia's Revenge, a masterful psychological study of a group of survivors in Montreal, describes the burden of guilt, shame, anger and terror, all shrouded in a veil of silence, that many carry throughout their lives.

Born in 1923, Rosenfarb began writing poetry at the age of eight. Soon after liberation, as a displaced person in Brussels, she submitted a poem, The Ballad of Yesterday's Forest, to a Yiddish journal. The poem made a sensation.

"They were very taken by this poem. First of all, I was young, I was a survivor, it was in the first weeks after liberation – they got extremely excited about it," she recalled. A British businessman-poet brought her to London and helped her publish her first poetry collection in 1947.

She arrived in Montreal in 1950, raised two children, taught at the Workmen's Circle, and became enmeshed in the city's famed Yiddish circle. She wrote The Tree of Life over a period of 13 years. She lived in Montreal for 50 years, relocated briefly in Toronto, then moved to Lethbridge several years ago to be with her daughter.

"I love Lethbridge because of the mountains, which are visible in the distance all the time. The landscape is beautiful. Lethbridge is nice and pleasant, it's warm and the traffic is not heavy. It's a sweet life."

Although some stories feature strong scenic representations of Montreal, utilizing the city's trademark circular staircases and famed Mount Royal cross, Canadian landscapes are generally under-represented or non-existent in Rosenfarb's fiction.

As with other Holocaust writers, the experience of Europe and the camps still dominate her literary imagination, even decades after she arrived on Canadian soil. When asked whether she believes the Holocaust will continue to occupy her creative efforts exclusively, she takes on a pensive look.

"This is what I wonder myself: whether the Holocaust holds me so tight that I can never free myself from it. I wouldn't want it to happen. I don't like it. But for the time being, I have to employ myself in all aspects of Holocaust memory and all kinds of things that happened during the war. Maybe one day I can go onto other things. Whether I will have time for it, I don't know."

The 328-page hardcover volume, Survivors, was published by Cormorant Books and sells for $29.95.

Israel wins World Cup qualifier on home turf

By DEREK FATTAL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Israel transformed a near-disaster into victory last week with a 2-1 comeback win in a World Cup qualifier against Cyprus – its first home game in three years.

Yossi Benayoun was the hero for Israel, netting a brilliant solo effort in the 64th minute after Michael Konstantinou had put the visitors ahead six minutes earlier. Walid Badir provided the winning touch, heading in a corner in the 74th minute to secure the win.

Israel (in blue) took another step towards the 2006 World Cup with a 2-1 victory over Cyprus in a home game in Ramat Gan. [Isranet photos]

Despite the victory, Israel was far from impressive. A scrappy opening period set the tone for the rest of the game, with Israel constantly throwing away possession in an evenly matched first half.

Captain Avi Nimni and Idan Tal failed to assert their authority in midfield, and Israel's best chances came from the spirited play of Benayoun, and some incisive passing by Adoram Keisi.

Coach Avraham Grant replaced the ineffectual Nimni with Pini Balili at the 57-minute mark. A minute later Konstantinou struck, latching on to a loose ball after goalkeeper Nir Davidovich parried the Cypriot's first effort in a goalmouth scramble. Three minutes later Stavros Georgiou had the ball in the Israeli goal again, but was called offside.

Israel looked on the verge of collapse when Benayoun restored parity with a brilliant individual effort. Seizing the ball just past the centre circle, the midfielder surged forward, took a detour to the left, then jigged his way through the entire Cyprus defence before scoring from a tough angle past goaltender Nikos Panagiotou.

Elsewhere in Israel's group, France lost captain Patrick Vierra to a red card as it barely beat the Faroe Islands 2-0, while Switzerland and Ireland shared the points in a 1-1 draw.

Israel got its World Cup qualifying campaign off to a strong start two weeks ago when it held out for a goalless away draw against France in Paris.

France had the best chances, but failed to convert them with William Gallas and Thierry Henry missing the target in each half.

Gallas had a header saved on the goal line by defender Klemi Saban, who gave an excellent performance after being called in at the last minute to replace the injured Shimon Gershon.

In the 18th minute, a sharp counterattack led by Henry, ended with Louis Saha failing to convert the cross after Henry outpaced the entire Israeli rearguard.

Davidovitch brilliantly blocked a six-metre attempt by Claude Makelele, who had been set up by Henry on 28 minutes and Saha almost found the net just before the interval but his header went just wide.

After holding out for the first half, Israel gradually began to hit its stride and created opportunities of its own, with Walid Badir forcing a clearance off the line from French substitute Ludwig Guli.

"The players gave everything and the result was encouraging. In the second half we could have had a goal," said coach Grant.

After two games, Israel is tied with France, Switzerland and Ireland atop UEFA Group Four, each with four points. The Faroe Islands and Cyprus are at the bottom without a point.

Despite the tie in points, Israel is in fourth place based on goal differentials. Switzerland leads UEFA Group Four with a goal differential of six, followed by Ireland at three, France at two and Israel at one.

Maccabi Tel Aviv advances in Champions League play

By ASHER GOLDBERG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Maccabi Tel Aviv earned a place in the group stage of soccer's Champions League with a 1-0 victory over PAOK Salonika at Bloomfield Stadium recently.

Maccabi began the game, the second leg of the third qualifying round, with a 3-0 advantage, thanks to a technical victory, as the Greek side had fielded a suspended player when the teams met in the first game.

Coach Nir Klinger told his charges before the game to avoid putting themselves under pressure and go for an early goal. That's just what his players did. In the eighth minute of the first half, Liran Cohen latched on to a pass from the right and fired home from inside the penalty area to put the home side ahead.

"I got the ball with no one next to me. I had time to stop, to look at the goalkeeper and score easily," Cohen said.

Klinger was overjoyed. "The big dream has been realized," the Maccabi coach said. "We are not going into the Champions League to serve as decor or for the purpose of taking part in the show. The thing that makes Maccabi Tel Aviv special is its hunger and ambition."

In other Champions League qualifying play, Maccabi Haifa blew a 2-0 lead and lost to Rosenborg of Norway. Maccabi Haifa, the Israeli league champions, led 2-0 but the Norwegians pulled a goal back at the 88-minute mark and evened the score on aggregate, sending the game into extra time. Haifa, reduced to 10 men early in the game, could no longer keep pace and conceded another two goals.

Fichman wins Under-18 Canadian Junior Championship

LAVAL, Que. — Top seed Sharon Fichman of Toronto was crowned champion after straight set wins at the Under-18 Canadian Junior Championships at Parc St. Victor earlier this summer.

Dominating from the baseline, 13-year-old Fichman controlled much of the play and proved why she is undeniably Canada's top female junior, claiming both the indoor and outdoor under-18 titles in 2004, as she defeated number 2 seed Ekaterina Shulaeva 6-1, 6-3.

"It was a great match," said Fichman. "I was really mentally prepared and wanted to win. Katie [Shulaeva] played a great match and I capitalized on a lot of shots. The score doesn't really indicate how close it was."

A couple of weeks later, Fichman did not fare as well at the Junior U.S. Open singles competition. She was defeated 6-1, 6-1 by Madalina Goinea of Romania.

Do your own thing, or date someone else

BY SANDIE BENITAH

While walking around Yorkville last week, I chatted up a hunk of a 25-year-old who wasted no time telling me that he is vice-president of his father's company and living in a great apartment that his daddy is paying for in the trendy Yonge and Eligible (Eglinton) area.

He was telling me his life story and I was realizing why I'm still single.

OK, perhaps I'm feeling some resentment for not having the same opportunities in life, but when did it become sexy to have everything handed to you?

When it comes to dating, I've always had one hard and fast rule: no working for your parents. Before I go on, I should be clear that this is a topic I've mulled over for quite some time. I realize that working for family can sometimes be a wonderful experience, and I know that there are men – and women – out there who work hard for their family businesses because they are genuinely interested in them. These are not the people I am talking about. I also understand that there are people who don't know what they want to do in life and, consequently, can't turn down a fabulous opportunity. Fine, I accept that, too.

But some young adults choose an easy life and an easy way into money. Life, especially when you're young and so many opportunities lie before you, should be about something more than making an easy buck.

I am talking about the 20-somethings out there who slept through school and never gave a second thought to what they wanted to do with their life or what their passions might be because they knew a cushy job awaited them when they were ready. I am talking about guys who don't know what it feels like to have their job application rejected or to struggle to make a living – in short, guys who know nothing about being a man.

There's something to be said about a guy who isn't afraid to take a risk to go after what he wants.

A few years ago, I dated a guy who had everything a girl could want — brains, looks, charm. Every time he opened his mouth to speak, he was so insightful and intelligent it made me melt inside. Mr. Perfect's dream was to be a teacher and he would have been great at it. Instead, he chose the safe route – his parents' successful empire – and in the process robbed hundreds of students of the kind of leader every kid deserves, and needs, to have.

Then there was the guy who couldn't even properly describe his job at his father's packaging company. The clincher came when he confessed, "Wow, I don't know what I would do if my father died. I'd be screwed." Touching, don't you think?

But my favourite was the 29-year-old who only went to law school because he was guaranteed a spot at his uncle's firm. He didn't have a part-time job, but he lived on his own in mid-town Toronto. His parents paid for his rent, his groceries, his trip to Mexico with his friends, his SUV, his clothes, etc.

That was when I adopted my dating rule.

Now, I'm not saying guys should pursue their impossible dream of joining the Maple Leafs or Aerosmith. I'm just looking for someone who won't shy away from the rocky path to success, because to me, overcoming obstacles is what success is all about. I don't even care if a guy actually succeeds in what he wants to do. All that's important is that he not be afraid to confront a challenge and work hard.

After all, what else can you ask of a guy in a relationship?

ORANGE ROUGHY W/HONEYED APPLES

4 apples peeled, cored & cut into thin wedges
1/2 cup margarine
1/4 cup honey
1/4 cup flour
1/4 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. black pepper
2 cups dried bread crumbs
1 egg, beaten
4 fish fillets (or any firm flesh fish will do)

Saute apples in 1/4 cup margarine in skillet until tender. Stir in honey, reduce heat and keep warm.

In shallow bowl, mix together flour, salt and pepper. Place bread crumbs in another shallow bowl and egg in a third bowl.

Dredge fish in seasoned flour, dip in egg, coat with bread crumbs. Bake coated fillets at 350°F for about 20 minutes or until fish flakes. Place fish on serving dish and spoon apples with honey over top of each fillet.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My brother got married a couple of years ago and his wife Laura doesn't seem to like our family very much. It seems like she puts up with us more than anything else.

My parents are getting older. I know they won't be around forever and I would like to make the things that are important to them really count. My brother Stan has refused my invitation to celebrate Rosh Hashanah in my home, as we traditionally do. He made a lame excuse about being too busy with the new house they just purchased.

I told him how important it would be for mom and dad, and he said he would call them to wish them a "Happy New Year." That's the best we can get out of him. I know Laura is behind his decision. We are all losing our grip on Stan and soon he will be completely lost to our family. Any suggestions?

Lost To Marriage

Dear Lost To Marriage

There is an old saying "A son is a son till he takes him a wife, a daughter is a daughter all of her life." Of course, this does not apply across the board, but it might in your situation.

Stan has to confront a conflict of loyalties. Either he lives with the wrath of Laura or the guilt of letting down his family.

Perhaps if you give him an out, so that Laura doesn't have to join him, he might come. Try saying, "I understand that the new house must be overwhelming, but maybe you could drop by for a little while so your parents can see their only son on Rosh Hashanah." This way Laura is off the hook and Stan is not obligated to stay all evening. If you are still unsuccessful, pull out the big guns. Have your parents call him and/or Laura directly. If he still says no, you'll have to make the best of Rosh Hashanah without him.

Stan has to learn to balance his new life with Laura and his old life with his family. It may take time, but hopefully he will get the mix right.

I would like to wish all our readers a happy, healthy New Year. Shanah Tovah.

Have an easy fast

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

"On the tenth day of this seventh month is the day of atonement… and you shall afflict your souls." (Leviticus 23)

Five minutes after I begin my tzom (fast) on Yom Kippur, a day called the Sabbaths of Sabbaths, I'm starving. It happens without fail every year, whether my pre-fast meal – an equal mitzvah to the fast itself – is a hearty dish of boiled chicken or a voracious banquet.

By the time evening services are finished, my throat is parched and I begin to feel at one with the desert Jews who stood at Sinai waiting for Moses to deliver the second set of tablets on Yom Kippur day. Yom Kippur has just begun.

The morning of Yom Kippur has its own distinct personality. Generally, it is sunny and friendly, but we are forbidden from brushing our teeth and, therefore, tend to distance ourselves from others. Despite the warm winds that usually accompany the day, we are unable to gaze upon it while coddling a mug filled with our redemptive morning coffee. It is at about this time that my annual curiosity is aroused about Moses' decision to call the Yom Kippur tzom a "feast."

Prior to the Torah reading, my stomach begins to growl with noises that are indigenous to Yom Kippur. They are shrill and protracted, sometimes staccato, and grow through the day with unpredictable might.

By around two o'clock, my head is pulsating and odd swollen veins stick out of my temples, indifferent to my constant massaging and kneading. By now, my temperament is sniffling, cantankerous and quarrelsome. My prayers, and what Nobel Prize winner, S.Y. Agnon calls "petitions of humble entreaty to propitiate God asking for remission of our sins," are faint at best, and I crave my second wind.

At four o'clock, I am filled with raging jealousy at those kids running around, spitefully, drinking orange juice out of a box with those bendable straws. If I could only have two or three gummy bears or a small piece of celery, I would be fine.

I stare at the clock and instinctively launch a countdown to the end of the fast, and a return to the mundane. Four hours left until the gates of heaven close. I force myself to look away. I look again.

Three hours and 59 minutes left. Only now am I starting to understand the Sages and their description of the fast as a way "to keep the soul from being at home in the body and to send it off to withdraw from corporeality like an angel." I am certain they are correct, as I can thoroughly sense my soul, but am numb to my physical self. Yom Kippur is making sense.

The sun is over the treetops, the Ark is open and we say Neilah, the final Yom Kippur service. My fellow congregants are in awe of my trembling fear standing before God, unaware that my shakes are a consequence of a hypothyroid condition exasperated and infuriated by a 25-hour tzom.

The shofar blows. "Hear O Israel." My friends wish me "Happy New Year" and comment on the ease of their tzom and wonder how mine was. I don't want to lie, especially minutes after the Days of Awe have ended, so I give a muddled response about finding it difficult to fast but feeling spiritually satiated.

Unaware of life as I knew it, I stumble out of shul, grab the railing and descend the stairs, looking madly for a confectionery store to purchase a bottle of apple juice, or a banana. Amazingly, I am no longer hungry.

Tzom kal. Have an easy fast, and may we all be sealed in the Book of Life.

Harmony of God's beautiful world

Editorial

The man was one of the most significant figures in Jewish history; indeed he was a towering figure in world history. His 800th yahrzeit, therefore, was too momentous an occasion for The CJN not to call it to the attention of our readers. And this supplement to the Rosh Hashanah edition of The CJN was the perfect opportunity to do so.

Thus, we asked four scholars to write about the life and teaching of Moses Maimonides, Rabbi Moshe ben Maimon – the Rambam, as he has lovingly been known to us down through the ages.

Arthur Hyman of Yeshiva University, perhaps the dean of all modern Rambam scholars, has written a broad survey article about Maimonides. Martin Lockshin of York University has written of Maimonides' daring intellectual endeavour to ascribe reasons for God's commandments (ta'amei hamitzvot). Eric Lawee, also of York University, has written about the backdrop of the Islamic times and culture in which Maimonides lived and their influence upon his writing, while James Diamond of Waterloo University has written more broadly about Maimonides' lifelong emphasis on rational discovery.

In sum, these renowned thinkers – all inheritors of Maimonides' driving search for external truth and inner honesty – provide a sketch for us of who the Rambam was and the magisterial scope of the vast legacy he bequeathed to us, his spiritually needy and intellectually striving people.

In truth, however, so enormous was the Rambam's contribution to future generations, that this cumulative scholarly sketch is but a faint charcoal outline on a large, mostly unmarked, stretch of canvas. It calls for more detail. But the details, we hope, will be filled in by readers' further reading.

As our readers will discover through the essays, Maimonides sought to reconcile the mystery of faith in the Divine with the power and probity of the human intellect, thus pointing out, in his own unique fashion, the unity and harmony of God's beautiful and bounteous world.

The Rambam's endeavour is as relevant in our super-scientifically charged world of today as it was in the pre-Renaissance Dark Ages of Christian Europe and in the uncertain, religiously churning world of Muslim Spain where Maimonides lived. Of course, someone like Maimonides comes along only once in every millennium. But we can all take heart from his example even as we can learn from his writings.

Our faith encourages us to struggle with the issues, just as he did. Some would say it even demands that we do so if we are to be true to the instruction inherent in the very name of our people, Yisrael – he will "strive" (or contend) with God.

Thus, perhaps, sometime during this Rosh Hashanah holiday, inspired by what our scholars have written and in a manner appropriate to our own abilities, we too might find the courage to struggle with and try to work through some of the personal issues of faith that might be vexing our own souls.

But there is a great deal of additional material in this supplement. There is a wide array of eclectic articles by fine writers to stimulate, edify, instruct, inform and generally entertain our readers.

We have also included a veritable gallery of photographs of major events from the year 5764 provided to us by our sources, Isranet and Israel Sun photographers.

We hope you will enjoy the offerings in this Rosh Hashanah Greetings supplement.

Shana Tovah Tikateivu Vetechateimu.

One of the greatest Jewish legal minds

By ARTHUR HYMAN

Moses Maimonides, the 800th anniversary of whose death is being commemorated this year, was, by general agreement, one of the greatest Jewish legal minds of all times and, at the same time, the outstanding Jewish philosopher of the Middle Ages. It is appropriate that we celebrate Maimonides at this time, since, as is true of any great personality, not only was he important during his own period, but we can still learn a good deal from him and his writings today.

Descended from a family of distinguished judges, Maimonides was born in Cordoba, Spain, in 1138. During his early years, he received a thorough grounding in biblical and rabbinic learning from his father Maimon and other teachers, and it appears that already, at an early age, he manifested an interest in the study of philosophy.

The prosperous and tranquil life characteristic of the Jewish communities in Muslim Spain came to a sudden end with the invasion of the Almohads, a rigorous North African Muslim group, in 1148, the year in which Maimonides was 10 years of age. Whereas previous Muslim rulers had been tolerant of non-Muslims – Jews and Christians – the North African invaders demanded conversion to Islam or exile.

Unwilling to convert, Maimonides' family began a period of wandering in Spain and North Africa and the year 1160 found it in Fez, Morocco. These years are shrouded in darkness, but it is possible that the conversionist zeal of the Almohads subsided for awhile or that they permitted some non-Muslims to remain. But the years of wandering were not wasted. Ever the eager student, Maimonides continued his rabbinic and philosophic studies. By his own testimony, it was during this period that he learned medicine from Muslim physicians.

In spite of some possible de facto tolerance, the conditions of the Jews under Almohad rule did not improve substantially, and in 1165, the Maimonides family decided to leave. At first, they planned to live in Palestine, which was then under Christian rule, and after a perilous sea voyage of one month, they landed in Acre. The Jewish communities of Palestine were small, poor and insecure and after a stay of five months, marked by pious pilgrimages to Jerusalem and the graves of the patriarchs in Hebron, the Maimonides family went to Egypt where, after a stay in Alexandria, they settled in Fustat (Old Cairo). After years of wandering the family finally came to rest.

For the next eight years, Maimonides was able to devote himself to full-time study and writing. His brother David supported the family by dealing in precious stones, but when David drowned in the Indian Ocean during a business trip to India, it became Maimonides' task to support the family. Reluctant to accept appointment as a rabbi, Maimonides turned to the practice of medicine to earn his livelihood.

The beginnings were difficult, but slowly he established a reputation as a physician, and in 1185, he was appointed as court physician of al-Fadil, the vizier of Saladin, who had become ruler of Egypt. The years that followed were marked by an active professional and communal life, and Maimonides continued to write books, treatises and numerous letters to Jewish communities and individuals throughout the world who sought his legal and spiritual advice. Some 400 of his letters are still extant.

Moses Maimonides from the Cordoba Statue

In a letter to Samuel Ibn Tibbon, the Provençal scholar, who translated Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed from the original Arabic into Hebrew, Maimonides describes his routine as follows:

"My duties to the Sultan [that is, the vizier] are heavy. I am obligated to visit him every day early in the morning; and when he or any of his children, or any of the inmates of his harem are indisposed, I… must stay during the greater part of the day in the palace… even if nothing unusual happens. I do not return to Mizr [Fustat] until the afternoon. Then I am almost dying with hunger… I find the antechamber filled with people, both Jews and gentiles, nobles and common people, judges and bailiffs, friends and foes."

After a brief meal, the only one during the day, he sees his patients until nightfall and, sometimes, into the night.

"I am so exhausted," he reports, "that I can scarcely speak."

Even the Sabbath provides no rest. The letter to Ibn Tibbon continues:

"On that day, the whole congregation, or at least the majority of the members, come to me after the morning service, when I instruct them as to their proceedings during the whole week. We study together a little until noon, when they depart. Some of them return and study with me after the afternoon service until the evening prayers. In this manner I spend that day."

'Maimonides was the model of a Jewish intellectual'

After a rich life marked by the professional activities of a physician, service to the Egyptian Jewish community and to Jewish communities throughout the world, and unequalled literary activity, Maimonides died in Fustat on Dec. 13, 1204. So great was the loss that the community of Fustat declared a three-day fast, and public mourning was observed throughout the Jewish world. According to tradition, his remains were taken to Palestine where they were buried in Tiberias. To this day, pious pilgrims visit his grave there. Posterity has said of him that from Moses (the prophet) to Moses (the son of Maimon), there was no one like him.

Possessed of a keen and probing mind, unequalled mastery of rabbinic and philosophic learning, and the power of incisive and orderly literary expression, Maimonides was the model of a Jewish intellectual who, faithful to the beliefs and practices of his religious tradition and fully versed in the philosophic literature of his day, tried to integrate the two realms. These concerns motivated him to undertake a three-fold program to which he adhered throughout his life: to summarize and organize the vast body of rabbinic learning in order to provide practical legal decisions for the day-to-day life of every Jew; to enlighten the Jewish masses by providing a more philosophic approach to their religious beliefs; and to guide the perplexed intellectuals who found it difficult to reconcile apparent contradictions between the teachings of religion and philosophic truths.

The author of hundreds of responsa, expert religious-legal opinions which address such matters as prayers, holidays, marriage, divorce, contracts, partnerships, thefts, ritual purity and many other topics, Maimonides made three major contributions to rabbinic scholarship. The first was The Commentary on the Mishnah (technically titled The Book of Illumination), dealing with the Mishnah, a basic rabbinic work. This work was completed when Maimonides was 30 years of age. This commentary was followed by The Book of Commandments, a work devoted to the enumeration and discussion of the 613 commandments contained in the Torah. Finally, Maimonides composed the Mishneh Torah (The Repetition of the Torah), his magisterial code of Jewish Law.

The first two of these works were written in Arabic, Maimonides' native tongue, though subsequently they were translated into Hebrew. Only the third was originally written in Hebrew, though in mishnaic Hebrew at that.

According to ancient tradition, recorded by Maimonides in the introduction to his Mishneh Torah, the Torah was given to Moses in two parts: the written Torah, recorded in the five books of Moses; and the oral Torah, first transmitted by word of mouth, but collected in writing and redacted in the early third century of the common era as the Mishnah by a Palestinian teacher, Rabbi Judah the Prince. This was the work on which Maimonides wrote his commentary.

Once the Mishnah was available, it subsequently became the subject of study and discussions in Babylonian and Palestinian rabbinical academies. These discussions were at first transmitted orally, but in the end they were once again collected and set down in writing as the Babylonian and Jerusalem

'Guided by a grand vision'

(Palestinian) Talmud. But whereas the Mishnah contained legal opinions, the two Talmudim contained records of the rather free-flowing discussions that occurred in the Babylonian and Palestinian academies.

By the time Maimonides arrived on the scene, predecessors had written responsa stating what the practical law was in particular cases, had composed summary works for particular areas of law, such as the laws of inheritance, and had even written legal codes, but an authoritative code covering all of Jewish law was still lacking. To provide such a code was the task Maimonides undertook in his 14-volume Mishneh Torah.

Aware of the need to organize Jewish law and present it in authoritative form, Maimonides was guided by a grand vision. Not only would he include in his Mishneh Torah those laws still practised by the Jews of his day, but also such laws as those of the Temple and sacrifices which had not been practised for centuries, but which, he seemed to hope, were to be practised once again in messianic times.

Having presented the great need for writing the Code: "in our days, severe vicissitudes prevail... the wisdom of our wise men has disappeared... only a few individuals comprehend the legal teachings," he writes in the introduction to the Mishneh Torah, and after listing the vast body of rabbinic literature he had carefully studied, he states, with the self-confidence so characteristic of all of his writings:

"I have entitled this work Mishneh Torah [The Repetition of the Torah], for the reason that a person who first reads the Written Law and then this compilation, will know from it the whole Oral Law, without having occasion to consult any other book between them."

While in a large portion of the Mishneh Torah Maimonides appears as the dispassionate legal scholar who, having weighed the opinions of his predecessors, decides the law, there are other sections in which he appears as the man of practical wisdom, moral sensitivity and human compassion.

Emphasizing that human beings have free will and that human happiness depends on what a human being does, he states that it is within a human being's power to become righteous or wicked, wise or foolish, merciful or cruel, and miserly or generous. Urging teachers to be patient, he advises that, should a student not understand the lesson the first time, the teacher should repeat it again and again. Speaking as a physician, he advises moderation in food and drink. Commenting on the biblical law requiring honesty in commercial dealings, he decrees that if the seller knows that an article he is selling has a defect, he must inform the buyer about it. To communal leaders he says it is forbidden to lead the community in a domineering and arrogant manner, but they should exercise their authority in a spirit of humility and reverence. Finally, while he grants that it is commendable to give alms to the poor, he says it is better to find work for them so that they no longer need to beg from other people, but become financially independent.

Written to provide practical guidance for people in the community and to aid rabbis in rendering legal decisions, Maimonides' legal writings contain a feature absent from earlier and later codes – the intellectual enlightenment of ordinary people. How strongly he felt about the importance of correct opinions, even for ordinary people, emerges in the Mishneh Torah from his branding as a heretic someone who believes that God has a body or possesses bodily attributes. He similarly writes in his Guide of the Perplexed that even children must be taught that God does not

'First to compose list of 13 beliefs'

possesses a body, and that there is no likeness in any respect between Him and His creatures.

To foster correct opinions, Maimonides began his Mishneh Torah with a Book of Knowledge and he listed the Thirteen Principles of Belief that were already in his early Commentary on the Mishnah. Certain beliefs are, of course, recorded in the Bible and certain beliefs appear in the rabbinic writings and in prayers, but Maimonides was the first to compose what he considered an authoritative list of 13 beliefs and he was the first to require that, in order to be considered a Jew, one must affirm all of these 13 beliefs.

Maimonides' 13 principles appear as a commentary on a section of the Mishnah that states that three persons do not have a part in the World to Come, the afterlife: he who denies the resurrection of the dead, he who denies the divine authorship of the Torah; and the Epicurean, whose beliefs are not spelled out but who is possibly someone who has false beliefs concerning God. Putting a positive interpretation on this negative saying, Maimonides requires that a Jew must have certain beliefs about God, the Torah, and reward and punishment and the afterlife.

Beliefs about God consist of the belief that He exists, is one, is incorporeal, is eternal, and that He alone is to be worshipped. Beliefs about the Torah consist of the belief that God inspires prophets, the prophecy of Moses is superior to that of other prophets, the Torah came from God and the Torah is eternal and immutable. Beliefs about reward and punishment and the afterlife consist of the belief that God providentially knows individual human beings and their deeds, that He rewards those who obey the commandments of the Torah and punishes those who disobey them, that the Messiah will come at some future time, and that the dead will be resurrected.

As a result of Maimonides' standing as a legal scholar, versions of these principles were included in various prayer books. In the Ashkenazi prayer book, they appear as the Yigdal and the Ani Ma'amin. Yet in spite of Maimonides' insistence on the authoritative and required nature of the 13 principles, contemporaries as well as successors both defended and challenged his opinions for the remainder of the Middle Ages, and his ideas are still a subject for debate in modern times.

While there are philosophic elements in Maimonides' legal writings, the full-fledged exposition of his philosophic views was reserved for his Guide of the Perplexed, a work composed between 1185 and 1190. The Guide shows that Maimonides mastered the Islamic philosophic literature of his day, but, by his own admission, it is not a work on pure philosophy. He wrote the work for a former student, Joseph ben Yehudah, and others like him, who, convinced of the truths of the beliefs of the Torah and adhering faithfully to its commandments but having studied the philosophical sciences, had become perplexed by the apparent conflict between the literal meaning of biblical terms and parables and the teachings of philosophy.

No conflict between Bible and philosophy

He wanted to show these people, first of all, that a comparison of the language of biblical texts discloses that there is no conflict between the two. To that end, he argues that, already in the Bible, terms describing God using words related to the human body in some verses have a spiritual, non-corporeal meaning in other verses. Thus, for example, while the Bible speaks of the outstretched arm of God, it has in mind the abstract property of divine power, and while it speaks of the eyes of God, it has in mind, the abstract property, divine providence. The Guide is, then, first of all, a work of biblical interpretation designed to teach a spiritual conception of God.

Maimonides devotes a large portion of the first book of the Guide to this topic, the linguistic comparison of biblical texts.

But the Guide is more than a work on biblical interpretation. It is also devoted, in Maimonides' language, to revealing "the 'secrets' of the Torah." By this he means that, behind the rather simple biblical text, there lay profound, philosophic teachings about God, the world and human life. These can be discovered by philosophic interpretation and speculation. Following the order of the Guide, these topics are: divine attributes; proofs of the existence, unity and incorporeality of God; the nature of angelic beings; creation of the world; prophecy; the nature of evil; divine omniscience; divine providence; the nature of the Torah and the reasons for its commandments.

While the technical aspects of these discussions need not detain us, let us get some sense of Maimonides' opinions by analyzing what he has to say about God and human beings. If there ever was a "God-intoxicated" philosopher, it was Maimonides, not Baruch Spinoza. It was man's task in life, Maimonides held, to understand of God whatever is within the capacity of the human intellect, and man's eternal happiness in the World to Come, the afterlife, consists in contemplating God. Jewish tradition had always made the love of God the highest goal of human life, but it had generally identified this love with the observance of the practical commandments of the Torah. While Maimonides made the observance of these commandments an important part of the Jewish religious life, he daringly identified the ultimate form of the love of God with knowledge and contemplation of Him.

The Guide is more than a work on biblical interpretation

Maimonides writes: "It is known and certain that the love of God does not become closely knit in man's heart till he is continuously and thoroughly possessed by it and gives up everything else in the world for it... One only loves God with the knowledge with which one knows Him. According to the knowledge will be the love. If the former be little or much, so will the latter be little or much."

In line with this conviction, Maimonides offers at the beginning of the second book of the Guide four proofs for the existence of God based on certain features of the world. All these proofs are designed to show that a careful examination of the world discloses that there exists a first being, God, who is the ultimate principle of the world. Based on proofs offered by Islamic philosophers, these proofs were later embraced by Christian philosophers.

We have already seen how Maimonides used the comparison of the language of biblical texts to show that attributes describing God by means of terms taken from the human body, already in the Bible, have a non-corporeal, non-physical meaning. But in addition to addressing this problem by means of a comparison of biblical texts in the early part of the Guide, he addresses it in a more philosophical manner in the latter section of the first book and at the beginning of the second book. This time the issue is how can Jewish tradition maintain that God is one and yet describe Him by means of many attributes? If God is totally one, how can He, at the same time exist, be living. be wise, be provident, be jealous, be angry, be merciful and long-suffering?

Accepting a distinction common in medieval philosophy, Maimonides distinguishes between attributes of two kinds: essential and accidental. Essential attributes, examples of which are "existing," "living" and "wise," are such that their denial requires that the being to which they are attributed ceases to exist once these attributes are denied. Accidental attributes, by contrast, such as "jealous," "angry," "merciful," are such that they can be denied without the requirement that the being to which they are attributed ceases to exist. For it is possible that a being is angry at one time, but merciful at another.

'Well-being of the intellect is more noble than the well-being of the body'

Maimonides held that essential as well as accidental attributes introduce multiplicity into that to which they are attributed, so that neither attribute can be applied to God in any positive way. To solve the problem, Maimonides maintains that accidental attributes attributed to God do not describe any property in Him, but describe his actions. Essential attributes attributed to God, similarly, do not describe any property in Him, but describe what He is not. God is merciful, for example, signifies that God performs merciful actions, while God is one, signifies that God is not many.

In his philosophy of man, Maimonides once again undertakes to bring the literal meaning of the Bible close to philosophic truths. At first glance, it appears that the Bible teaches that human happiness is attained through the observance of the divine commandments in the practices of day-to-day life – the Bible seems to have little interest in beliefs and philosophic speculations. Not so, argues Maimonides. If, as the philosophers teach and judicious interpretation of the Bible seems to confirm, human beings have not only a body, but also possess a mind, it seems to be inconceivable that the Torah, in its commandments, should neglect the human intellect.

Expressing this conviction, Maimonides writes in the Guide: "The Torah as a whole aims at two things: the well-being of the soul [intellect] and the well-being of the body... the well-being of the soul [intellect] consists in the multitude's acquiring correct opinions, corresponding to their respective capacity... the well-being of the body is achieved through two things:... .the abolition of [persons] wronging one another... and the acquisition by every human individual of moral qualities that are useful for life in society."

Continuing his exposition, Maimonides adds, that of these two goals, the well-being of the intellect is more noble than the well-being of the body.

Maimonides' conception of the centrality of the human intellect in the life of man was important not only for his conception of the role of man in this world, but also for his conception of man's eternal beatitude in the afterlife, the World to Come. Life in the present world, according to Maimonides, consists in the acquisition of the moral and political virtues as well as in the acquisition of correct opinions, but existence in the World to Come consists solely in the contemplation of God.

Approvingly citing the rabbinic statement that "in the World to Come there is neither eating, drinking, washing, anointing and sexual intercourse, but the righteous sit, their crowns on their head, enjoying the radiance of the divine presence," Maimonides comments, "'With their crowns on their heads' signifies the immortality of the soul [intellect] through the intelligible concepts inhering in it; 'enjoying the radiance of the divine presence' means that these [eternal intellects] enjoy blissful delight in their attainment of the knowledge of the true nature of the creator, blessed be He."

Guide of the perplexed of his own day, Maimonides became the teacher of Jews and Christians for generations to come. In Jewish circles, his legal writings, especially his Mishneh Torah, inspired commentaries, critical evaluations and subsequent codes of Jewish law, and, until this day, scholars ponder the wisdom of his work. The training of no contemporary rabbi, no matter to which group he belongs, is complete without some familiarity with Maimonides' great code. The Guide of the Perplexed determined the course of Jewish philosophy for the remainder of the Middle Ages to the extent that there appeared hardly any philosophic work that did not cite, comment on or, as the case may be, criticize Maimonides' views. Beyond that, the Guide had a seminal influence on philosophers of the Jewish enlightenment, and to this day, scholars and theologians study the work.

Similarly "Rabbi Moyses," as the scholastics called him, was a respected author in Christian circles and his Dux neutrorum or Dux dubitantium aut perplexorum, as the Guide was called in its Latin translation, was a regularly studied work. Among Christian scholars influenced by the Guide was Thomas Aquinas, the great Christian theologian. Even today, Maimonides is of interest to scholars of all groups. A critical edition of the Latin version of the Guide is in preparation, a relatively recent journal carried an exchange between two non-Jewish theologians concerning the validity of Maimonides' negative theology, and only last year, a book devoted to a critical evaluation of his 13 principles of Jewish belief was published. Maimonides was a blessing to his own generation and he continues to be a blessing to ours.

Maimonides the apologist

By MARTIN LOCKSHIN

The variety of ways in which Moses Maimonides expanded the boundaries of knowledge in the 12th century is astounding. Had he only written dozens of state-of-the-art medical treatises that would have been enough. Had he only contributed to the history of Jewish legal writing by composing the first ever comprehensive, accessible and organized code of Jewish law (the Mishneh Torah) that too would have been enough. In the eyes of much of the world, he is remembered as the author of one of the greatest works of medieval philosophy, the Guide of the Perplexed. And he was hardly a bookworm who spent his life in an ivory tower. He was a Jewish communal leader and a very busy physician with a demanding practice. It is not surprising that Maimonides is understood in so many different ways by scholars today, since very few of us are really able to appreciate all the sides of his multifaceted persona.

Maimonides was a master of many fields, and he was also an innovative synthesizer. He did not believe in the compartmentalization of knowledge. He brought philosophy into his books of Halachah and he discussed details of Jewish law in his philosophical works.

Maimonides was also not one to shy away from controversy. Perhaps one of the most beloved sections of his difficult book, the Guide of the Perplexed, is the 25 or so chapters that are dedicated to ta'amei hamitzvot – reasons or rationales for the commandments of the Torah. The enterprise of speculating about those reasons was controversial in the history of Judaism. There are a number of arguments against it.

First of all, if the Torah writes that something is forbidden and does not say why it is forbidden, it might be seen as arrogance for a human being to explain what the Torah perhaps did not want explained. And in fact, who says that any individual law has a specific rationale? Could it not be that the Torah simply lists laws whose purpose is to tame human beings and convince us that we are not the ultimate power here on earth? Besides, there is a significant danger in providing rationales for commandments of the Torah. What happens if you justify a law before the Jewish public based on some rationale that you think is convincing and then it is later discovered that the rationale is in some way wanting? Won't that bring the law into disrepute? Wouldn't it be better just to say that the Torah is God's will and that we humans will never truly understand God?

Maimonides tried to provide individual rationales for almost all of the Torah's 613 commandments.

Yet Maimonides tried to provide individual rationales for almost all of the Torah's 613 commandments. Some were more convincing than others. He has often been blamed for offering a justification for the kashrut laws that, to put it gently, does not impress people in our modern world. Maimonides wrote quite bluntly that foods that the Torah labelled non-kosher are not good for human health (Guide, 3:48). Today, few medical experts would agree.

Interestingly, the health explanation of kosher laws did not originate in the philosophical circles of Maimonides' Sephardi world. A generation or so beforehand, Rabbi Samuel ben Meir (Rashbam) in northern France, a great rabbi with absolutely no philosophical training, wrote: "All the animals… which God forbade to the Israelites [were forbidden] because they are repulsive. They damage and heat up the body. That is why they are called impure." Though Rashbam had no training in medicine either, he finished off his comment by writing that "Outstanding physicians also concur with this explanation" (Commentary to Leviticus 11:3). So both Ashkenazi and Sephardi rabbis in the 12th century were marshalling the medical knowledge of their era in an attempt to provide a rationale for a commandment of the Torah, a rationale there is no hint of in the text of the Torah itself.

With other commandments, Maimonides' efforts were often far more successful and persuasive. Very often he introduced logical and rational reasons into the understanding of the laws. For example, you might think that the Torah outlawed cursing, in the verse "do not curse the deaf" (Leviticus, 19:14), because of the concern that curses have power to inflict damage on a person. But Maimonides wrote that cursing was outlawed mostly because of the bad effect the curse has on the person who utters it (Sefer ha-mitzvot, negative commandment 317).

Maimonides provided another rational explanation for the law of the eglah arufah, the heifer whose neck is broken. The Torah (Deuteronomy, 21:1-9) describes the unusual ceremony that takes place when a murder victim is found lying in the open outside of town and the murderer is unknown:

"The elders shall go and measure the distances from the corpse to the nearby towns. The elders of the town nearest the corpse shall take a heifer… down to a watered wadi… There in the wadi they shall break the heifer's neck… They shall wash their hands over the heifer… and they shall make this declaration: 'Our hands did not shed this blood.' And they shall be absolved of bloodguilt."

The simplest reading of the text is that this ceremony is meant to absolve the townsfolk of guilt for this murder. But a rationalist like Moses Maimonides probably was very uncomfortable with the idea that murders could be expiated through breaking a heifer's neck.

Uniquely Maimonidean contributions

Maimonides came up with a novel, rational understanding for this ceremony. He argued: "[When this ceremony is performed,] in most cases there will be many stories and discussions among the people because of the investigation, the going forth of the elders, the measurements, and the fact that the heifer is brought there. Thus, because of the matter being universally known, the killer perhaps could be recognized." (Guide, 3:40) In other words, the purpose of this ceremony is to generate publicity and discussion about the murder, with the ultimate goal that the murderer be found.

Still it cannot be claimed with certainty that this novel explanation was actually Maimonides' innovation. Virtually the identical explanation may be found in the works of a contemporary rabbi who lived in northern France, Rabbi Joseph Bechor Shor, who wrote that "God commanded all this so to provide a voice for the murder victim and to create a commotion in the cities around… When the heifer's neck is broken and then the heifer is buried – a very peculiar act – it… will sometimes lead to the murderer being found." There is no reason to think that these scholars – Maimonides and Bechor Shor – ever met, and no evidence that one of them read the works of the other. (Maimonides' Guide written in Egypt in Judeo-Arabic did not arrive in northern France very quickly; there is little reason to think that Bechor Shor's Torah commentary was known and read in Egypt right after it was written.) Sometimes scholars think of the Ashkenazi and Sephardi worlds of the Middle Ages as two Jewish solitudes that had virtually no contact. But it seems that leading scholars of both of these worlds were dealing with some of the same intellectual questions and sometimes coming up, perhaps independently, with similar answers.

But there were definitely uniquely Maimonidean contributions to the field of ta'amei hamitzvot.

First of all, Maimonides explained many of the Torah's laws as polemics against the idolatrous practices of ancient nations that no longer existed in Maimonides' time. He made serious efforts to learn whatever he could in the 12th century about the gentile world in the days of Moses (more than 2,000 years before). He used that knowledge to explain unusual laws of the Bible, such as the law against eating fruit during the first three years of a tree's life or the law against grafting different kinds of trees together, both of which, he said, were directed against ancient idolatrous practices (Guide, 3:37). While some of the particular explanations that Maimonides arrived at are arguable, the principle of his approach is shared by many contemporary Bible scholars, who believe that the more we know about ancient polytheistic religions the better we will understand the Bible.

Maimonides also argued passionately in defence of the idea of searching for ta'amei hamitzvot. He knew the arguments against trying to find the reasons for the laws of the Torah, and he knew that some people believed that the Torah's laws should not be seen as having specific reasons. Yet he had no patience for that approach:

He provided an ideological defence

"There is a group of human beings who consider it a grievous thing that causes should be given for any law; what would please them most is that the intellect would not find a meaning for the commandments and the prohibitions. What compels them to feel thus is a sickness that they find in their souls… For they think that if the laws… had been given to us for this or that reason, it would be as if they derived from the reflection and the understanding of some intelligent being. If, however, there is a thing for which the intellect could not find any meaning at all… it indubitably derives from God." (Guide, 3:31)

Maimonides forcefully rejected the argument that the sign of a divine system of law is that it is beyond the scope of rational thinking. Religion, according to Maimonides, is not meant to take us out of the rational world to some level of consciousness where the rules of reason and logic do not apply. Anybody who thinks so has a "sickness in his soul." Maimonides continued: "According to these people of weak intellects, it is as if man were more perfect than God; for man speaks and acts in a way that leads to some intended end, whereas God does not, but commands us to do things that are not useful for us and forbids us to do things that are not harmful to us… The contrary is the case; the whole purpose [of the Torah] consists of what is useful for us."

The most crucial contribution that Maimonides made to the field of ta'amei hamitzvot is not in the detailed explanations that he offered, but in the ideological defence that he provided for the system. He believed that a Jew did not have to choose between reason and revelation. Religion need not and should not be the celebration of the absurd and the illogical. Maimonides' system is the antithesis of the famous dictum of Tertullian and Augustine, "credo quia impossibile" – I believe because it is impossible. To the contrary, according to Maimonides, a person who is committed to a life of reason and intellect will find much of value in the Torah.

Maimonides and his Islamic world

By ERIC LAWEE

Moses ben Maimon, also known as Maimonides, was born in Muslim Spain in 1138 and died in Muslim Egypt in 1204. In between, he spent his whole life in the Islamic world. How did he view Islam? In what ways was he indebted to his larger Muslim milieu? How did he evaluate the Jewish experience under Islam and counsel Jews to respond to their larger Muslim environment? Before providing some (fleeting) answers to these questions, a few words are in order about the state of the Islamic world in Maimonides' day and the major turning points in Maimonides' life there.

Maimonides and the Golden Age of Islamic Civilization

When Maimonides was born in Cordoba in 1138, the Islamic world, though no longer at the height of its power and splendour, remained a crucible of global civilization. Baghdad and Cairo were among the world's great cities. Trade thrived in the bustling marketplaces stretching from Muslim Spain – "al-Andalus" – in the west to the vast Islamic domains of central Asia in the east. Arabic remained a premier language of learning, transmitting ancient teachings in mathematics, optics, medicine, astronomy, and philosophy while helping to communicate new discoveries in these and other disciplines. (As Martin Kramer has observed, had Nobel Prizes existed in the year 1000, they would mostly have gone to Muslims.) The Muslim world also boasted some of the world's architectural wonders, including Cordoba's Great Mosque and the Alhambra in Granada, which remains the centrepiece of this Spanish city today.

To be sure, not all was in order in Maimonides' day in the "abode of Islam" – dar al-Islam– as Muslims refer to the Islamic part of the world. Then as now, the professed unity of the Islamic body politic was more fiction than fact. Two examples that would prove decisive for Maimonides illustrate the point. In 1148, when Maimonides was 10 years old, he and his family witnessed the terrifying invasion of Muslim Spain by the fanatical North African Almohade dynasty. This fundamentalist Berber tribe repressed the blend of Muslim piety and cosmopolitanism that had long been the hallmark of al-Andalus and outlawed religions other than Islam, forcing Andalusi Jews and Christians to choose between conversion to Islam, exile, or death. As a result, Maimonides and his family ended up in Egypt where, a few years after their arrival, the longstanding attempt of the Shi'ite Fatimid dynasty to claim rulership over the Islamic world was put down by Salah al-Din (Saladin), who conquered Egypt and inaugurated Sunni (Ayyubid) rule there.

With the arrival of the Almohades in Spain, Maimonides' family faced a difficult decision: where to go? While most Andalusi Jews headed north to find refuge in the ever-expanding domains of Spanish Christendom, the Maimon family opted to remain in the Islamic domain. After leaving Cordoba and wandering in Spain for some time, they emigrated to Morocco before heading for the land of Israel in 1165. Following a brief stay in inhospitable Crusader Palestine, during which they managed to pray at the site of the temple in Jerusalem, they headed for Egypt.

'Head of the Jews'

There, following Saladin's ascension to the sultanate in 1171, Maimonides rose to prominence under the patronage of al-Qadi al-Fadil, Saladin's chief administrator. In addition to serving as a physician at Saladin's court, Maimonides assumed the position of Ra'is al-Yahud, "Head of the Jews," which involved him in all manner of communal tasks, up to and including a campaign to ransom Jewish prisoners captured by Crusaders in 1168. Maimonides eventually married into a prominent Egyptian Jewish family. His only child, Abraham, who would follow in his father's footsteps in many ways, was born in 1186. A year later, Saladin returned Jerusalem to Muslim hands after its interval under Crusader rule. One wonders about Maimonides' sentiments on that occasion.

In Egypt, Maimonides completed the works that assured him of his reputation as one of Judaism's greatest scholars. He concluded his Commentary on the Mishnah, begun during the years of wandering, in 1168. He wrote the magisterial legal code, the Mishneh Torah, between 1168 and 1178. And he put finishing touches on his great theological magnum opus, the Guide of the Perplexed, around 1190. Maimonides died in 1204, having lived in Egypt for nearly 40 years.

Maimonides on Islam

In evaluating the religion of Islam, one factor was paramount for Maimonides: its incontestable monotheism. In his Epistle on Apostasy, addressed to Jews in North Africa and Spain suffering under Almohade oppression, Maimonides argued that a Jew asked to choose between forced apostasy to Islam and death should proclaim the Muslim declaration of faith and save himself or herself rather than suffering martyrdom (kiddush Hashem) – a ruling founded on Maimonides' certainty that Islam is a monotheistic religion.

Similarly, writing in a halachic context (Mishneh Torah, Hilchot Ma'achalot Asurot, 11:7), Maimonides stated that "any gentile who is not an idolater, like the Ishmaelites [i.e., Muslims] – their wine is prohibited from drinking but permitted for benefit." In a responsum addressed to a convert to Judaism named Ovadyah, Maimonides again insisted that Muslims ascribe to God "a unity concerning which there is no doubt." (In a telling aside, he added that though Muslims might lie about aspects of Judaism, this was "no reason for us to lie about them and say that they are idolaters.")

Not only did Maimonides uphold Islamic monotheism, he accorded it a significant role, along with Christianity, in the admittedly inscrutable divine plan for humankind. Writing at the end of Mishneh Torah, he suggested that, like Jesus, Muhammad "served only to clear the way" for the Messiah (Hilchot Melachim, 11:4; the citation appears in a larger passage long ago deleted by censors that remains missing in standard editions of Maimonides' code in use today). On this understanding, though Islam and Christianity both claimed to surpass the Torah, by spreading a variety of Jewish ideas to "the far isles," both unwittingly prepared the way for the Torah's ultimate triumph.

'Maimonides retained strong disagreements with Islam'

Even as he viewed Islam as a purely monotheistic faith that had advanced the cause of Abrahamic religion by bringing millions of polytheists to belief in the one true God (whom he calls Allah in his Arabic works), Maimonides retained strong disagreements with Islam. Not only did he deny the prophethood of Muhammad, as would be expected, he clearly thought little of Muhammad as a person, daringly calling him a "madman" in one place. Maimonides also objected to the Muslim claim that Jews had deliberately falsified the text of their Holy Scriptures, a charge that Muslims levelled against Christians as well. In a responsum, Maimonides argued that it was "permitted to teach the commandments to Christians" precisely because they shared a belief in the text of Tanach in common with Jews, in contrast to the Muslim view "that this Torah [as we have it] is not from God." While probably considering Islam the religion closest to Judaism, Maimonides deemed it a derivative faith. Though possessing worthwhile features, it owed these to Jewish teachings and practices that predated Islam by millennia.

Maimonides and "Islamicate Civilization"

Maimonides was a full participant in what the eminent Islamicist Marshall Hodgson has called "Islamicate civilization." By this, Hodgson meant not the religion of Islam but the "social and cultural complex historically associated with Islam and the Muslims, both among Muslims themselves and even when found among non-Muslims" (The Venture of Islam, vol. 1, p. 59).

Maimonides' debts to Islamicate civilization were many, beginning on the basic level of language. Maimonides wrote most of his works (including Jewish works such as the Commentary on the Mishnah and the Guide) in Arabic, a language that had developed into a powerful tool of scientific expression since Islam's rise in the seventh century. (At the same time, Maimonides contributed significantly to bringing Hebrew up to speed on this score.)

'He read deeply in a wide array of Arabic literatures'

Maimonides learned medicine from Muslim doctors and received instruction in science and philosophy from Muslim teachers. He read deeply in a wide array of Arabic literatures. His espousal of a rationalist religious orientation reflected trends imbibed by him from the tradition of Greco-Arabic learning that flourished in Muslim lands in the centuries prior to his birth (even as this tradition of openness to non-Muslim learning began to ebb in Maimonides' day, yielding before, in Hillel Halkin's words, a "numbing religious orthodoxy" to which the Islamic world remains enthralled to this day).

Even aspects of his comprehensive code of Jewish law – that stunning accomplishment one always feels must have been written by dozens of scholars over decades – bear connections to Maimonides' Muslim milieu. This is most evident in its opening chapters, with its philosophic introduction to Judaism's "foundational" beliefs, but also, it may be suggested, in its lucid and methodical exposition of the totality of Jewish law, which rabbinic tradition had bequeathed to Maimonides in such a defiantly unsystematic form.

Whatever his view of Islam's merits and defects, Maimonides was convinced of the superiority of Muslim culture to its counterpart in Christian Europe. Writing to Samuel ibn Tibbon, the son of an Andalusi émigré scholar living in Christian southern France, he expressed amazement that a Jew born among Christians should nevertheless be "a devoted student of the sciences." Maimonides' perception of Christendom and its Jewries as culturally and intellectually backward was typical of representatives of the "Jewish Golden Age" in Muslim Spain. Nonetheless, Maimonides perceived a sharp decline in Jewish learning in the Islamic world during his lifetime. In a letter written near the end of his days, he opines that such learning is dead or dying in the Islamic world and has a future only in Christian Europe.

Maimonides on Jewish Life Under Islam

As Maimonides' career shows, one did not have to be Muslim to participate in the political, economic, and cultural life of Islamic civilization. Yet non-Muslims living in Muslim lands hardly enjoyed equal status with their Muslim neighbours. Those who, as distinguished from other infidels, met a basic monotheistic criterion, like Jews and Christians, were granted the status of dhimmis: "protected" permanent residents permitted to live in Muslim society as long as they maintained a low religious and social profile. Still, in return for recognizing the primacy of Islam and superiority of Muslims as well as submitting to a number of statutory disabilities, including payment of a special tax, dhimmis were allowed to practise their religion largely free of outside interference.

• More often than not, legal conditions governing the dhimmis went unobserved. In some cases, deviations from these formal rules allowed Jews and Christians to achieve positions of power and prestige within Muslim society. An exceptional case is the mid-11th-century talmudist and poet, Samuel ibn Naghrela (Shmuel Hanagid), who served as vizier in Granada and personally led his Muslim city-state's army into battle in obvious violation of the rules of proper dhimmi subordination. Another example is Maimonides who, especially after the Fatimids' fall, moved in Cairo's cultural and political upper echelons.

'Life under Islam is extremely discouraging

To be sure, deviation from the formal standing enjoyed by dhimmis could work against them, yielding intolerance and stigmatization beyond sanctioned norms that, on occasion, spilled over into expulsion or massacre. Even before the Almohade invasion of al-Andalus in 1148, Jews were victims of such excesses when, in 1066, Shmuel Hanagid's son and successor, Joseph, was assassinated and Granada's Jews were slaughtered in large numbers.

For all that he benefited from broad exposure to Islamicate civilization, Maimonides' most direct assessment of Jewish life under Islam is extremely discouraging. In a letter of instruction and consolation sent to the Jews of Yemen, whose lives had become desperate due to a decree of forced apostasy, Maimonides affirmed that "on account of our sins, God has cast us into the midst of a people, the nation of Ishmael, who persecute us severely… No nation has ever done more harm to Israel." In words that could have been written today, he added that "the more we… choose to conciliate them, the more they choose to act belligerently toward us."

'Dhimmitude' was a source of pain and humiliation to Maimonides

Clearly "dhimmitude" was a source of pain and humiliation to Maimonides. (The term "dhimmitude" is a coinage of Bat Yeor, or "Daughter of the Nile," the pen name since 1974 of Gisèle Littman, a contemporary Egyptian-born Jewish writer who has little or nothing good to say about the fate of dhimmis in Islamic society, both in pre-modern or modern times.) In the circumstances of his day, Maimonides was compelled to suppress his rage at the "degradation" that the dhimmi system imposed. He likewise urged Yemen's Jews to "be silent, and bear" their condition on the grounds that any other response would only court a more dire fate.

Maimonides and the Dar al-Islam in Contemporary Context

In recent times, Maimonides' starkly negative verdict on Jewish life in the Muslim world has been revived and broadcast by a number of writers seeking to overturn a longstanding perception of Jewish-Muslim relations during the "classical period" of Jewish life under Islam (in the 10th to 12th centuries CE) as a sort of interfaith utopia. The impetus for this revised picture is partially political. That is, the new stress on a darker vision of pre-modern Jewish life in Islamic lands has been driven in part (though by no means in all cases) by this myth's invocation by Arab propagandists seeking to lay the blame for conflictual interactions between Jews and Muslims in recent times on the rise of Zionism. Needless to say, historians worry when contemporary political concerns threaten the search for accurate perceptions of the past.

Maimonides' harsh verdict requires careful analysis

In fact, Maimonides' harsh verdict on pre-modern Muslim (or perhaps Arab) treatment of Jews requires careful analysis. For one thing, it presumably reflects the uncharacteristically abusive Muslim persecutions of Jews in Maimonides' day in his native Spain, Yemen, and elsewhere. (One assumes that Maimonides appreciated the far better situation of Egyptian Jewry during his lifetime.) Then too, when Maimonides affirms that "no nation" ever harmed Jews as much as "Ishmael," was he fully taking into account previous and contemporary Christian maltreatment of Jews, such as the devastation of Germany's Jewish communities during the First Crusade? Indeed, how much did Maimonides know about the often troubled history of Christian Europe's Jewries prior to his day?

Whatever may be the answers to these questions, it seems that most historians continue to accept the view that medieval Jewish life "under the crescent" was, by most measures, far more comfortable than medieval Jewish life "under the cross." (Of course, historians would also agree that Jewish life in Tsarist Russia was far better than in Nazi Germany – which is obviously not saying much.) More than anything, though, the complexities of Maimonides' relationship to things Islamic and Islamicate remind us of the need to avoid black-and-white conclusions, be they in the form of an oversimplified idealization of a "Jewish Golden Age" under Muslim rule or thoroughgoing despair that the Islamic world might never again nurture the sort of open-minded religiosity and general human excellence that are so uniquely attested to in the life and works of Moses ben Maimon.

Maimonides' Legacy: 800 and still counting

By JAMES DIAMOND

Eight hundred years have passed since the death of R. Moses ben Maimon (Maimonides) and during that time, not a moment has gone by in any hall of Jewish learning without some serious attention to the man and his thought.

So overpowering were his contributions to Jewish philosophy, Halachah, biblical interpretation and legal theory that virtually every current in Jewish thought since the Middle Ages intersects or originates with Maimonides at some point. His "13 principles of faith" virtually redefined Judaism as a creed, dogmatising an essentially dogma-less faith.

After the 12th century, no Jew would ever be able to practice or contend with a Judaism whose features lacked some Maimonidean stamp, whether theoretical or practical. One need only look at a recent bibliography compiled of academic studies pertaining to Maimonides containing 600 new entries for the last decade alone.

Considering the near obsession with his thought in the rabbinic world, one could conclude with confidence that many times that number have appeared during the same period. Indeed, the old Jewish proverb, "From Moses until Moses none compares to Moses" can safely be taken as fact rather than mere hyperbole.

His formidable intellectual legacy inspired impassioned debate, reaching such levels of intensity as to result in communities being fragmented, bans being issued and ultimately books being consigned to flames. These debates rage on to our day, with every camp imaginable enlisting Maimonides' authority as an endorsement of whatever theological or halachic position is being advocated to the point where it has jokingly been affirmed, "There is Maimonides, Yourmonides, Hismonides, etc."

> 'Religion, for him, was not something shrouded in mystery'

Maimonides' earliest work, a treatise on logic, written while still a teenager, set the pace for what was to be his lifelong love affair with reason and science. Everything, including the teachings of Torah and the rabbinic tradition, must pass the test of logic. For example, although Maimonides ostensibly subscribed to a belief in creation out of nothing (creatio ex nihilo – itself a subject of debate), his intellectual honesty compelled him to admit that had Aristotle persuasively demonstrated the world was eternal he would read that theory into the first chapters of Genesis.

Religion, for him, was not something shrouded in mystery that required blind submission to authority and tradition. On the contrary, he explicitly identified mesorah and long standing beliefs – what we would term religious heritage as an inferior form of knowledge.

It would be a mistake to impose modern sensibilities, which tend to bifurcate secular education from Torah education, onto his thought. The Creator can only be known through his creation and that entails gaining an expertise in all its working parts. Understanding nature, for Maimonides, is a religious activity. His was a holistic conception of the world where all truth, be it science or philosophy, is Torah because it is necessary for the ultimate religious enterprise – knowledge of God.

For Maimonides, a human being's "image of God," in which the original man and woman were created, consists of intellectual capacity and therefore one cultivates one's humanity by exercising the mind. If God's sole activity is thinking, then the ultimate religious mandate of imitating God (imitatio dei) is to think.

The pursuit of knowledge becomes a God-like activity with its loftiest object being God himself. His motto was to seek the truth whatever its source even if that source was the likes of Aristotle, who himself did not acknowledge two of the most fundamental beliefs in Judaism (which Maimonides himself formulated), of either a creator God or a providential God.

Maimonides' penchant for order and clarity led him to construct the first major codification of rabbinic law which, up to his time, could only be found in the vast tomes of the Talmud whose complex, argumentative and chaotic presentation was impenetrable to all but the very few of the rabbinic scholarly elite.

Yet, the 14-volume compilation, boldly intended to supersede the Talmud as the ultimate halachic encyclopedia, and even more boldly entitled the Mishneh Torah (The Second Torah – a name subsequent halachists avoided for its perceived arrogance) is far more than mere classification and organization of law. It is also marked by philosophy, science, medicine, and history.

'The emphasis is on rational discovery'

His rational approach is evident in its opening sentence, "The basic principle of all basic principles and the pillar of all sciences is to know that there is a First Existence..." Shortly thereafter, he defines the commandment to love God as "contemplating His great and wondrous works and creatures and from them obtain a glimpse of His wisdom."

The emphasis is on rational discovery. Intimacy with the divine is conditional on prodigious efforts to accumulate wisdom from every possible source. Consistently, he concludes the first volume of his Mishneh Torah, appropriately entitled Book of Knowledge, with the categorical assertion that "One only loves God with the knowledge with which one knows Him. The love is proportionate to the knowledge... A person ought therefore to devote himself to the comprehension and understanding of those sciences and studies which will inform him concerning his Master..."

Abraham, God's supreme "lover," rediscovered the lost truths of monotheism by an arduous process of autodidactic deliberation and study only completed at the age of 40. Maimonides rejects the midrashic tradition that Abraham was three when he discovered God, not only because it is absurd, but, more importantly, there would be nothing to learn from such a "miraculous" event. What kind of model would a three-year-old prodigy pose for the future of Judaism?

Likewise, in one of his other major works, the Mishnah Commentary, he remarkably naturalizes a story we are all familiar with from the Passover Haggadah. The great Tanna, R. Eliezer ben Azaryah's imprecise declaration of his age as "I am like a 70 year old," is traditionally understood to refer to his miraculous overnight transformation from adolescent to senior citizen so as to command respect for his new position of authority.

Maimonides attributes his elderly appearance to premature aging because of his strenuous, laborious and sleepless dedication to the study of Torah. The story is infinitely enriched once it has been demythologized. Abraham and R. Eliezer are now religious archetypes from which one can actually learn something, though the lesson of probative and intense study may not be as attractive as the immediacy of the miraculous.

Maimonides' ongoing attempt to demystify religion and his own tradition was part of his project to reconcile what he perceived had become for many an irresolvable tension between the dictates of reason and those of revelation, also known as the conflict between Athens and Jerusalem. The formal subject matter of those tensions consists of the two most esoteric realms within the Jewish corpus – the account of the Creation (first chapters in Genesis – maaseh bereshit) and the account of the Chariot (Ezekiel's vision at the beginning of his book – maaseh merkavah).

Maimonides identified them with the sciences of his day, formally known as physics and metaphysics, or the nature of the world, the nature of God and the heavenly bodies and the relationship between them. Although highly abstruse fields, they were still firmly within Maimonides' rational curriculum of study, in stark contrast to its later kabbalistic and earlier mystical connotations.

In his Mishneh Torah, he considered these two accounts to be the very apex of intellectual, and ipso facto religious, activities to which human beings can aspire, far more important and meaningful than the give and take of the Oral Law.

His magnum opus devoted to these subjects is the Guide of the Perplexed, a hefty and dense work written in Judeo-Arabic (Arabic in Hebrew characters – a reminder of an intertwining of cultures that is unimaginable in today's political climate), as a private communication with his most beloved of students, Joseph ben Judah.

'The Guide challenges us'

In an age when ideas and beliefs were matters of life and death, Joseph and other intellectuals like him were experiencing a disturbing, and familiarly modern, crisis of faith. Their proficiency in both the philosophy and science of their day as well as their own Jewish texts had led them to what they thought was an either/or choice.

Since these two bodies of knowledge were at odds, they could not remain honestly committed to both. They would have to either renounce their allegiance to the Torah or live with it at the cost of intellectual dishonesty. The last option would plunge them into a state of existential anguish where they "would not cease to suffer from heartache and great perplexity."

The Guide offered a solution to these troubled individuals in the form of a radical new approach to biblical and rabbinic texts, which liberated them from their literal constraints.

Since virtually all biblical descriptions of God are anthropomorphic, they lead to false conceptions of God. The Torah's basic vocabulary had to be reinvented. In Maimonides' hands, many of the fantastic biblical narratives were intended as parables and philosophical allegory, and not as historical accounts. He compared their literary structure to "apples of gold in silver filigree," where only the silver is seen from a distance, while the gold can be discerned, as one gets closer. In doing so, the Guide challenges us to pierce through the literal "silver" and re-examine more closely every single principle that is crucial to Judaism whether it is the nature of God, providence, prophecy, creation, miracles or the purpose of the commandments.

God defies any description whatsoever and is incapable of change. God cannot see or talk because He bears no physical characteristics such as eyes or vocal chords. Ultimately the only appropriate theology is a negative one where all one can say about God is what He is not. When the Torah has God seeing, it means "God knows." God "stands" means God is stable and unchanging.

The theological implications of this kind of God, though, are troubling since they tend to minimize God's contact with and involvement in the world. Since God is unchanging, how can He respond to historical events, which are constantly in flux? Any such response would imply that God was affected by the event – but God can't be affected since He is absolute perfection.

If He responds it implies that He changed by doing something at one instant which He did not do before. If God doesn't hear or change then what use is prayer, another daily mainstay of Jewish religious practice? How can God be petitioned if He cannot be affected? How can we address Him in prayer as "great, mighty, awesome, etc." when He is in fact none of these? Even worse, a belief that these are accurate descriptions of God is tantamount to idolatry!

The offense is compounded, since idolatry is the worship of something non-existent while ascribing attributes to God, no matter how flattering, distorts the nature of an existent being. Divine providence, he asserts, is purely a function of intellectual achievement, in his words, "I believe that providence is consequent upon intellect and attached to it."

If so, what precisely is God's involvement in watching over human beings? What is the destiny of those who are observant of the mitzvot and ethically righteous but fail to follow the path of knowledge? Are they simply ignored by God and abandoned to the vicissitudes of nature? Prophecy, he asserts, is an automatic result of rational, moral and imaginative perfection. It is both "not possible that an individual should be fit for prophecy and prepared for it and not become a prophet," and impossible for God to turn an ignoramus or any unqualified person into a prophet "except as it is possible that He should turn an ass or a frog into a prophet."

Empowered and burdened humanity

This theory seems to deny God any active role in revelation, weaken His omnipotence to do whatever He wills, and do away with any significant distinctions between a prophet and a philosopher. Maimonides both empowered humanity and burdened it by imposing the onerous responsibility of self-attainment at the cost of forfeiting the comfort of divine paternalism.

Perhaps the most controversial aspect of Maimonides' thought is his rationalization of the commandments or taamei hamitzvot.

The single overarching rationale for the mitzvot is to eradicate idolatry and inculcate an authentic conception of monotheism. He rejected the traditional distinction between commandments classified as chukim (e.g. dietary laws; prohibited mixtures of wool and linen) as non-rational and mishpatim (e.g. prohibitions against civil offences such as murder and theft) as rational. For Maimonides, all commandments are rational, the sole difference being that the reasons for chukim are more difficult to determine.

'Overarching rationale for the mitzvot is to eradicate idolatry'

The forms the mitzvot take are geared toward human nature and, in particular, the psychology of the ancient Israelites. Following his general outlook that God does not miraculously change human nature, Maimonides could not accept that, after spending hundreds of years dominated by a pagan culture, the Jews of Egypt could have become pure monotheists overnight. Human nature cannot tolerate such abrupt changes and so the mitzvot aimed at weaning the Jews off the idolatrous ideology they had been accustomed to and easing them into a belief in pure monotheism.

For Maimonides, animal sacrifice is a pagan mode of worshipping God, so why the pervasive occupation of the Torah with the sacrificial cult? Maimonides' theory is that since this was the predominant form of worship in the ancient Near East it would have been too much of a shock to the human psyche to simply abolish it outright. The plan was to take pagan practice and subvert it from within by regulating it, restricting it and turning it on its head – legislating it out of existence.

The sacrificial system is firstly narrowed down to a select class, the priests, and a specific location, the Temple. The choice of sheep or goats for the paschal sacrifice was determined precisely because they were worshipped by the Egyptians. The idea was to take the very objects deified by the Egyptians and slaughter them.

The host culture viewed its blood as a bad omen so therefore the Jews sprinkled its blood on their doorposts as a frontal assault on the pagan belief – to "proclaim what is contrary to them, and bring forth the belief that the act, which they deemed to be a cause of destruction, saves from destruction." However, the implications that the mitzvot are historically contingent, elicited fierce resistance. Is there no intrinsic value to ritual?

To compound the problem Maimonides seems to contradict himself by suggesting, in the Mishneh Torah, a reestablishment of the sacrificial cult in the messianic period. Once the urge to sacrifice has been overcome, why return to its primitive rites? These questions vexed, and continue to vex, up to the present time.

I have offered just a sampling of the intriguing questions emerging from this great work, but, whatever the answers are, Maimonides' lasting accomplishment is to encourage Jews to struggle with these issues, and not simply accept tired "handed down" clichés as the operative principles by which they guide their lives and relationships with God.

Finally, any account of Maimonides' legacy would be deficient without a word about his vision of the utopian existence Jews daily anticipate – the messianic age. Here his naturalistic tendencies find their logical fruition in the maxim, "the world will follow its normal course."

Passion for the truth

He is emphatic that the messianic period will evolve historically and will not be characterized by miraculous events. Its advent will be marked by Jewish political sovereignty, ingathering of exiles, international peace, and universal worship of one God. These are very specific criteria for establishing the credentials of the Messiah. Any leader who achieves them qualifies and, conversely, failure to bring them about is foolproof evidence of disqualification.

More importantly though, the messianic epoch is a time when petty tribalism, nationalism and ethnic loyalties will no longer be around to distract the human race from cultivating their humanity, when, "the one preoccupation of the whole world will be to know the Lord."

Its essence is captured by the figure of Elijah, the traditional herald of its imminent arrival, whose function is, according to the sages of the Mishnah, not to use genealogy as a yardstick for membership within the community, but solely "to make peace in the world."

Maimonides exquisitely elucidates this mishnaic opinion as follows: "The sages hold that there is no evil in ethnic background [yichus] because everyone's yichus ultimately traces itself back to the truth [emet] and the Torah is the father of everyone, while real evil lies in the hatred between men."

Briefly, the messianic age is a time when yichus will be replaced by truth as the only relevant indicator of one's humanity. Biological ancestry will be rendered irrelevant by a common ancestry rooted in the truth of the Torah. This conception of the Mashiach is consistent with his notion of who is a Jew.

He categorically rejected the Judah Halevian and later kabbalistic notions (which seem to have garnered far more mass appeal), of naturally born Jews' essential superiority over gentiles and even converts. In fact, Maimonides considered the convert superior to the biological Jew as reflected in his letter to Ovadiah the convert, which stated "Do not belittle your yichus for we can only trace our lineage back to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob whereas you can trace yours directly to 'He who spoke and the world came to be.'" For Maimonides, conduct and intellectual endeavour, not heredity, is what determines a person's identity.

Maimonides' passion for the truth and its dissemination was his own contribution to the realization of this messianic ideal. His approach to religion is a demanding one because it entails a perpetual search for truth rather than the comfort of the hard and fast answers people so crave.

Despite the derision and controversy he himself predicted his writings would elicit, he persisted in publishing for the benefit of posterity. What motivated his selfless efforts is best expressed by his introductory words to the Guide: "I am the man who when the concern pressed him and his way was straitened and he could find no other device by which to teach a demonstrated truth other than by giving satisfaction to a single virtuous man while displeasing 10,000 ignoramuses – I am he who prefers to address that single man by himself, and I do not heed the blame of those many people. For I claim to liberate that virtuous one from that into which he has sunk, and I shall guide him in his perplexity until he becomes perfect and he finds rest."

For those who wish to explore Maimonides further, the following books on different aspects of his thought are recommended: Isadore Twersky, Introduction to the Code of Maimonides, (Yale University Press, 1980), excellent overview of the Mishneh Torah; Menachem Kellner, Maimonides on Judaism and the Jewish People, (SUNY Press, 1991), on Maimonides' universalism; David Hartman, Maimonides: Torah and Philosophic Quest, (Jewish Publication Society, 1976), on the relation between his halachic and philosophical writings; Kenneth Seeskin, Maimonides: A Guide for Today's Perplexed, (Behrman House, 1991), a concise and accessible explication of key concepts in the Guide.

Prof. James Diamond holds the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Chair of Jewish Studies at the University of Waterloo, Waterloo, Ontario and has published widely on Maimonides. His own book is entitled Maimonides and the Hermeneutics of Concealment.

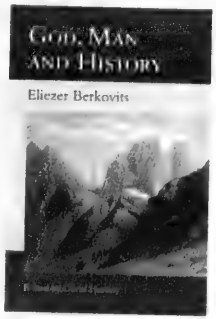
God, Man and History

The following is an excerpt from God, Man and History by Eliezer Berkovits, edited by David Hazony (Shalem Press, 2004).

Judaism is not an "idealistic" or a "spiritual" religion, but a human one. It is a religion for the whole of man. It aims at relating life in its entirety to God. It is not, therefore, so much a religion of creed as it is the religion of the deed on earth. The intellect or the soul may be satisfied with the creed; the whole man, however, may serve God only through the deed. The deed... is born of the union of body and mind; in the deed alone may the two join together, complementing each other to mutual advantage.

The deed, however, is essentially social; and in order to be, it must find its place in the external world of man. It is social because it is always expressive of a relationship. Most intimately, it is the relationship between body and soul. The contribution of the body to the deed necessarily places the deed in the world outside of man. The deed, directed to the outside, is always in relationship to an "other." This other may be the world, a neighbor, or God. However, in order to be, the deed must be effective; and it must be so in the place where it belongs – in the external world, in history. In fact, the deed is the stuff of which history is made....

For the deed to be effective, it must not remain the act of an individual, but must become that of a community. The deed makes history if it is the materialization of the desire and will of a community of people joined together in a common cause. It is obvious that the community of the deed is not a church. A church is the outgrowth of that very dualism that Judaism aims to overcome: A church is essentially a community of believers and worshippers, a spiritual community; it is not foremost a community of doers. Because the deed is to be effective in the external world of man, the community that it requires must be a living society in reasonable control of its general order of life. This general order must be such that it will not render the deed of Judaism impossible or "unnatural." Even the purely religious aspects of the Jewish deed are most intimately interwoven with community existence. If, for instance, the Sabbath were a purely spiritual day, to be observed in the heart alone through meditation and inner quiet, the economic structure of the society in which the Jew lived would have little or no bearing on its observance. But since the Sabbath, like any other mitzvah, is a deed, requiring rest for the body as well as the soul, the economic order is of the utmost relevance, even for the purely religious significance of the day. The most conducive environment for the Sabbath is, therefore, a society whose economic and industrial activities are at a standstill on that day. The Sabbath is most naturally at home in such a society. Thus the Sabbath deed, to be most effective, of necessity strives for the coordination of its own intentions with the material fabric and order of the community. This, however, may be most powerfully accomplished by a community that possesses sufficient sovereignty to fashion the practical structure of its own life in accordance with its desires.



Innumerable examples could be found to illustrate the point from among the "ritual laws" alone. Of far greater interest in this connection, however, are the laws governing interpersonal relationships. These cover all the areas of man's life: Family and society, law and trade, education and industry, peace and war. Nothing affecting human intercourse is excluded from the scope of these commandments. As always in Judaism, the goal is not the entertainment of noble ideals, but their realization in the external world of action and conduct. Therefore, the full implementation of Judaism requires a society that is prepared to submit its whole life to the ordering will of Judaism. But a society sufficiently free to do so is not a congregation or a church, not a philosophical school or an exclusive club, not even a communion of saints, but a nation – a people in control of, at least, the internal order of its existence. The mitzvah is a public deed, not a private one. One cannot be a Jew only "at heart"; one must be a Jew together with other Jews in history-making action.

A people in control of its own life, capable of implementing Judaism by applying it to the whole of life, is a people in its own land. Judaism, as the religion of the deed, requires a people in its land. The people alone can realize Judaism; in the land of the people alone may it be fully realized. Abraham was not the founder of a church, but the father of a people.

'A holy nation cannot live in complete isolation'

"And I will make of you a great nation," God promises him at the beginning of his career, and he immediately directs Abraham "unto the land that I will show you."...

The idea of a holy nation is not to be confused with that of nationalism. The goal of nationalism is to serve the nation; a holy nation serves God. The law of nationalism is national self-interest; the law of a kingdom of priests is the will of God. From the point of view of a nationalistic ideology, the nation is an end in itself; the holy nation is a means to an end. Since, however, the end is the wholeness of life in relationship to God, it obviously points beyond the national frame: The holy nation is the instrument for the realization of a supra-national purpose in history. The nation works toward a universal goal. As such, it does not exclude other nations; on the contrary, the end which it serves seeks the completion of its aspirations by means of these nations. The individual Jew does not live alone. Hence, if his deed is to be effective, he must unite with others in the common pursuit of Judaism's goal. The result is, inevitably, the holy nation. But a holy nation cannot live in complete isolation. The more far-reaching the understanding that a people of God achieves with the rest of mankind, the more effective its deeds. The greater the understanding, the wider the area of life that becomes God-oriented. The deed is therefore always public: The deed of the individual takes place in his immediate society, in the midst of his people; and the deed of the nation is undertaken in the context of the life of the nations. As the individual must make common cause with the community,

Nationality is a historical necessity

so the nation with the community of nations. Realization through the holy people of necessity points to fuller realization through mankind.

The goal of Judaism is accomplished when it is reached by all mankind. Since, however, the goal is not essentially the teaching of noble ideals – which would indeed be rather easy, and ineffective – but rather their realization in history, one has to start with the smallest unit of living reality within which the deed of Judaism may become history-making; and such a unit is the nation. Individuals may teach; a people is needed in order to do so effectively. Nationality here is not an ideological requirement, but a historical necessity. The gradual realization of the universal purpose in history is unable to dispense with the instrumentality of the holy nation. The universal purpose and its practical implementation in history determine the national characteristics of Israel. The "holy nation" is in fact the only people on earth whose very raison d'etre is the pursuit of a universal goal. It is the universalistic idea at the heart of Israel's existence which determines its national distinctiveness and uniqueness....

What is "last in deed" may of course be "first in thought"; in history, however, one cannot begin with mankind: One must start with man. One first builds humanity within oneself through an awareness of the other, which – implying a measure of reconciliation between body and soul within the individual – leads to the caring deed. But we render the individual deed effective by building humanity within the nation, by relating the entire scope of a relatively self-contained society to God. And one builds humanity by striving through the people for the final goal: To establish the world of mankind as the kingdom of God.

The late Rabbi Eliezer Berkovits was a theologian, philosopher, communal rabbi, and teacher. He was one of the 20th century's most significant and outstanding Jewish thinkers.

Born in Romania in 1908, Rabbi Berkovits was a student of Rabbi Yehiel Jacob Weinberg at the famous Hildesheimer seminary and earned a Ph.D in philosophy from the University of Berlin. After escaping Germany in 1938, he served as a communal rabbi in Leeds, Sydney, and Boston before assuming the post of chairman of the department of Jewish philosophy of Chicago's Hebrew Theological College in 1958. He taught philosophy and served as spiritual leader of Congregation Ohr Torah in Skokie until 1975, when he moved to Israel, where he concentrated on writing until his death in 1992.

He was a prolific writer who produced 19 books and dozens of articles and essays that touch on all aspects of Jewish philosophy and theology. His commitment to traditional Judaism was unwavering, but he was not afraid to voice his unease with certain trends within the Orthodox community. While he is known mostly for his writings on the Holocaust and Jewish law, his most important works discuss: Jewish morality; the relationship between man, God, and the world; and the meaning of the State of Israel. Rabbi Berkovits also grappled with the growing divide between "traditional" and "progressive" Judaism. He insisted that the Jews are one unified nation and pushed for greater flexibility in interpreting Jewish law in order to protect that unity.

Rabbi Berkovits believed very strongly in human responsibility for the course of history. About the Holocaust, he wrote famously that the real question is not "Where was God?" but "Where was man?" Humankind is responsible for the good and the evil that occurs in history. The purpose of Judaism, he believed, is to create a community of good people who take full responsibility for their actions, and who care for those in need.

To make this happen, the Jewish people must maintain its unity, its profound sense of solidarity and mutual obligation. Rabbi Berkovits was opposed to Jewish thinkers whose ideas would lead to the disintegration of the Jewish people. He was opposed to the social boycott that Orthodox Jews have tended to apply to Reform and Conservative congregations, and was in fact one of the first Orthodox leaders to speak in non-Orthodox synagogues. In this sense, he was truly "post-denominational."

His is a voice that articulates a coherent approach to Judaism that gives a prominent place to the ideals of proper

The Eliezer Berkovits Institute of Jewish Thought at the Shalem Center in Jerusalem was created by a partnership between the Shalem Center and the family of Rabbi Berkovits. Its purpose is to preserve and advance the life's work and thought of Rabbi Berkovits in all the fields in which he was involved, including: Jewish philosophy, morality, law, and theology; Jewish history, the Holocaust, and Zionist thought; the study of Bible, Talmud, and other classic texts; and contemporary issues affecting the unity of the Jewish people.

The institute is working toward these goals with activities including:

Publishing

The institute is: making Rabbi Berkovits' works available to the public, including editing and publishing new collections of his writings, such as Essential Essays on Judaism (Shalem Press, 2002); undertaking translations of his writings into English, Hebrew, and other languages, such as Essential Essays in Hebrew (Shalem Press, 2004); and arranging for the reissuing and distribution of existing essays that are not easily available, such as God, Man and History (Shalem Press, 2004).

Archives

The institute is home to the Eliezer Berkovits Archives, which will house all of Rabbi Berkovits' published books, published and unpublished papers and scholarly articles, private writings including responsa and correspondence, and other materials that might be pertinent for scholars interested in researching or writing about his life and thought.

Research and Conferences

The institute encourages research into the life and thought of Rabbi Berkovits by supporting new research by resident and visiting scholars and students, and sponsors lectures and conferences in Israel and around the world on the thought of Rabbi Berkovits.

Moving toward a common Judaism

By DANIEL POLISAR

Though sharp differences of opinion among Jews are hardly a new phenomenon, Jewish public discourse has become preoccupied in recent years with the fear that mutual hostility among the competing streams of Judaism is spiraling out of control, and that the Jews, as a people, no longer possess a shared outlook capable of uniting them.

This point was made most tellingly in a wave of prominent books including Jew vs. Jew: The Struggle for the Soul of American Jewry (Touchstone, 2000), by Samuel G. Freedman, which went so far as to insist that "civil war" was at hand. Though One People, Two Worlds: A Reform Rabbi and an Orthodox Rabbi Explore the Issues that Divide Them (Schocken Books, 2002) intended to highlight the possibilities for dialogue, it instead overwhelmed the reader with the degree to which the two rabbis – and by extension, Reform and Orthodoxy more generally – hold opposing viewpoints on virtually every matter of significance. Other books, including Milton Viorst's What Shall I Do with This People? Jews and the Fractious Politics of Judaism (The Free Press, 2002) and Noah Efron's Real Jews: Secular vs. Ultra-Orthodox and the Struggle for Jewish Identity in Israel (Basic Books, 2003), explored other aspects of the ways in which, the authors posit, the hope for unity among Jews is a lost cause.

These works reflect the fact that mutual animosity remains a feature of Jewish life, and strike a warning note that is worth heeding. Nonetheless, there is good reason to challenge their overly gloomy view: though fractious politics remain, the last several years' most significant developments point to a narrowing of differences. Jews of different movements have begun to draw together on many of the central issues that have been sources of division for nearly two centuries. Taken as a whole, these developments offer an unprecedented opportunity for co-operation and for a renewed effort to forge a unified Jewish people.

Mutual animosity remains a feature of Jewish life

Perhaps the most striking example is the Reform movement's shift towards traditionalism, which culminated in 1999 with the approval by the Central Conference of American Rabbis of a new set of principles expressing the fundamental beliefs of Reform Jews. Such comprehensive programs had been adopted on only three previous occasions: The Pittsburgh Platform in 1885, the Columbus Platform in 1937, and the Centenary Perspective in 1976. The first, which announced a radical departure from the tenets of traditional Judaism, was the best-known and the decision to return to Pittsburgh in 1999 was therefore symbolic.

To understand its significance, it is important to recall that the original Pittsburgh Platform, which Reform leader Isaac Mayer Wise termed a "Declaration of Independence" for liberal Judaism in America, had gone remarkably far in breaking with Jewish particularism and embracing a cosmopolitan, rational universalism. Its key provisions:

•abandoned the traditional Jewish concept of God and replaced it with an abstracted "God-idea";

•accepted "only the moral laws" of Judaism and rejected on principle practices such as kashrut;

•asserted that Reform Jews "recognize in the modern era of universal culture of heart and intellect the approaching of the realization of Israel's great messianic hope";

•and declared that: "We consider ourselves no longer a nation, but a religious community, and, therefore, expect neither a return to Palestine… nor the restoration of any of the laws concerning the Jewish State."

Over the next century, Reform moderated some of these positions, but none of the movement's subsequent statements came close to the tectonic shift registered in 1999. Most significantly, the new platform replaced Reform's commitment to personal autonomy, which had accorded the individual free rein to choose among Jewish beliefs and practices, with the affirmation that "the Jewish people is bound to God by an eternal covenant (brit)."

The rabbis declared on behalf of their movement that: through Torah study we are called to mitzvot, the means by which we make our lives holy. We are committed to the ongoing study of the whole array of mitzvot and to the fulfillment of those that address us as individuals and as a community. Some of these mitzvot, sacred obligations, have long been observed by Reform Jews; others, both ancient and modern, demand renewed attention as the result of the unique context of our own times.

Consensus emerging on state's public character

In embracing the study of all mitzvot, the Pittsburgh Principles opened up the possibility of a far more traditional form of Jewish observance, and the official commentary specifically mentions kashrut, tallit, tfillin, and mikvah (ritual immersion) "to demonstrate the principle that there is no mitzvah barred to Reform Jews...."

Lest there be any error regarding the magnitude of this change, the commentary declares: "This paragraph reflects the most significant break from the Pittsburgh Platform. By committing ourselves to study the whole array of mitzvot, Reform Jews affirm that all the mitzvot of the Torah can call to us as they call to all Jews...."

While the shift in the Reform movement has principally affected the Diaspora, Israeli Jews of differing religious outlooks have also begun coming together in ways that seemed unimaginable only a decade ago. None of the changes in the Jewish State has been as fundamental as the philosophical transformation within Reform, but, viewed collectively, the steps are quite significant.

In January 1999, the Israeli army received the tacit support of leading rabbis to establish the Nahal Haredi, a military unit that caters to the needs of ultra-Orthodox inductees. In the spring of 2000, the Tal Commission received the backing of prominent haredi rabbis for its recommendation to ease the path of yeshiva students into the work force by granting them a "year of decision," during which they could leave their studies and get jobs without immediately being drafted into the army. Significantly, those former yeshiva students choosing to continue working after that year were to be drafted into the army or national service. Coupled with diminished government subsidies for yeshiva study, this has led growing numbers of haredi men to join the work force in areas ranging from law and accounting to high-tech. Since the haredi community has long been resented in mainstream Israeli society for carrying too small a share of the country's military and economic burdens, these steps have the potential to bring the Jews of Israel closer together.

A consensus has also begun to emerge on the public character of the Jewish State, a source of conflict since the founding of Israel. One sign of the change was the Kineret Declaration, which was promulgated in October 2001 after being ratified by prominent representatives of Israel's humanist left, the Israeli branch of Reform, traditionalists, the "national-religious" camp, and the haredim. They united behind a ten-point document that explicitly recognized the contributions of the various groups to a common Jewish cause, and pointed the way to a peaceful resolution of central issues under contention.

A distinctive set of Jewish ideas

In 2002, a more detailed covenant was drafted by religious-Zionist educator Ya'akov Medan and liberal legal scholar Ruth Gavison, setting forth agreed-upon principles and proposed arrangements for the most contentious issues of religion and state, including public observance of the Sabbath, the role of the Orthodox rabbinate in marriage and divorce, the government's relationship to Reform and Conservative institutions, and the definition of who is a Jew. Such initiatives have gone a long way to debunking the claim that Israeli Jews are so deeply divided that no meaningful platform can unite them.

None of these developments, whether in the Jewish State or the Diaspora, erases the sharp differences that remain on issues such as patrilineal descent or the granting of legitimacy to gay marriages. Likewise, the growing convergence on the level of ideas does not automatically reduce tensions. But what the recent changes suggest is that the last several years have seen a bridging of differences on some of the most significant issues, and the creation of new opportunities for unity.

What, then, can be done to build on these trends? First and foremost, it is essential to recognize that the Jewish tradition is not only about shared culture and customs, but is based on a distinctive set of Jewish ideas, including: belief in one God, the possibility of discovering moral truth, individual dignity, the centrality of the family, private initiative, communal responsibility, the rule of law, national independence, and the ideal of universal peace.

Such ideas, which find their origins in the Hebrew Bible, held the Jewish people together through history, even as they exercised a decisive influence on the civilizations around them. And it is these same ideas that are reflected in various ways in all the leading Jewish streams today, giving them a strong family resemblance despite differences of opinion in major areas of doctrine and practice.

These ideas are our common heritage, and the time has come to set about defining for ourselves a common Judaism,

Uniting Jews with the great ideas of our tradition which can serve as a core of ideas upon which the great majority of Jews can and do agree. By focusing on this core, it is possible for scholars, rabbis, and laymen to strengthen the widely-felt intuition that Jewish unity reflects a reality that goes well beyond a tribal sense of brotherhood.

This kind of approach will, of necessity, mean a diminished focus on denominationalism. For several generations now, Jews have become accustomed to defining themselves primarily with reference to the issues on which they disagree: the mechitza separating men from women in synagogue, the ordination of gays and lesbians as rabbis, the use of guitars on the Sabbath, and so on. Such issues will continue to provoke debate; a focus on ideas that unite Jews does not require anyone to give up his or her beliefs on such matters, nor does it suggest the demise of the existing denominations.

What is needed, though, is a change in paradigm along the lines suggested a century ago by the scholar and educator Solomon Schechter, who in His Majesty's Opposition called on Jews holding different viewpoints to see themselves as belonging to competing political parties within a single, great republic: though opposed to one another on some issues, they should regard themselves first as citizens of the Jewish people, advancing the interests of the nation and the common creed for which it stands; and only secondarily as partisans seeking to move the nation towards a particular understanding of that creed.

Such an approach does not negate the role of comparison, but shifts its focus. Instead of highlighting differences among the movements of Judaism, it suggests that it is more revealing to consider how Judaism as a whole differs from the leading civilizations, philosophies, and religions with which it is in competition, whether these be Christianity, Buddhism, or the main streams of Enlightenment thought.

This is not a kind of discourse that is very familiar these days, but this does not mean that there are no models for it. One can consider, for example, The Jews: Their History, Culture, and Religion (1955), edited by Louis Finkelstein, chancellor of the Jewish Theological Seminary; Where Judaism Differs (1956), by Abba Hillel Silver, a leading Reform thinker and activist; or Radical Then, Radical Now (1991) by Jonathan Sacks, the Orthodox Chief Rabbi of Britain.

Such comparisons must be made fairly and honestly, with humility and a respect for the truths contained in the teachings and practices of other peoples. At the same time, however, a great deal can be gained by considering the real differences between Judaism and its competitors in the realm of ideas, demonstrating with balanced scholarship where our tradition has made a major contribution, and showcasing areas in which it has the potential to make further contributions to humanity.

Indeed, at the heart of a common Judaism is the belief that the ideas that unite Jews can benefit mankind as a whole, and that the age-old vision of improving the world is one in which all Jews can share. Though uniting Jews around the great ideas of our tradition is no small task, the prospects for success are greater today than at any time in recent memory.

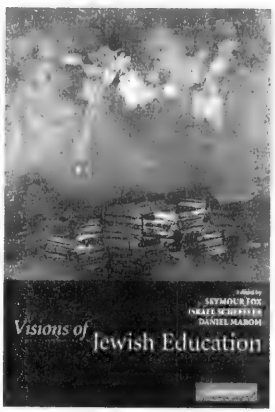
'The very best thinking of several major Jewish minds'

By SEYMOUR EPSTEIN

Last spring, Daniel Marom wrote two articles for The CJN on a project of the Mandel Foundation in Jerusalem that centres on a book called Visions of Jewish Education, which he edited with Seymour Fox and Israel Scheffler (Cambridge University Press, 2003). Marom is a Toronto native and CHAT graduate, and I was fascinated to read his perspective from Jerusalem, familiar as he is with our Jewish schools. The article inspired me to finally acquire the book and give it the attention it deserves.



I stress here that the volume demands a certain degree of respect in that it sums up a decade of discussion and deliberation on vision as an essential and critical element in educational planning. It also brings together in one book the very best thinking of several major Jewish minds on the single issue of Jewish education, and it challenges all of us who labour in this field, lay and professional alike, to rethink our most basic premises, to review our axioms, and to refresh our own visions with the deliberative energy released in this book.

One of the great dangers of being a school principal, or the director of a central agency for Jewish education, is the isolation and insulation provided by the physical, curricular and organizational parameters of the institution. There are, out there, hundreds of successful educators who are quietly running their schools, mentoring their teachers, designing curriculum, and building a school community, but they are doing it alone and are somewhat lonely.

The walls of the school, its ideological perspective, and its forms of pedagogy create a small world, sheltering the inside players (which can be good) and preventing too much external distraction (which can be bad). I deliberately refer to successful schools where there is little gap between the goals of the institution and the actual teaching and learning that exists. Even in those schools, for example, it is very difficult to get teachers to observe teaching in another setting. This excellent book reaches out to senior educators with a model for discussion that promises, both in content and in form, to ease their isolation and to give them improved vision, clearer and larger in range.

I am not convinced that sad educators who have given up many years ago and who are running schools that are without any vision or planning will benefit from this work. The sophistication of the debate and the elegance of the design are, by definition, reserved for thinking and thoughtful teachers.

The book is in three sections. Part 1 describes the Visions Project at the Mandel Foundation and the actual operation of the project. It then proceeds to provide an overview of the six visions, which constitute the core of the volume. Part 2, the main course, is composed of six essays and six corollary supplements.

1. What Must a Jew Study – and Why was written after the 1997 death of Isadore Twersky by Marom based on Twersky's notes and discussions in the project. Twersky was the director of Jewish studies at Harvard University and represents a rationalist stream of Orthodox Judaism.

2. Jewish Studies in Israel from a Liberal-Secular Perspective is the contribution of Menachem Brinker, a scholar of Hebrew literature and philosophy at Hebrew University and the University of Chicago.

3. We Were as Those Who Dream: An Agenda for an Ideal Jewish Education was written by Moshe Greenberg, who teaches Bible at the Hebrew University and who has trained a generation of Bible teachers.

4. Reflections on the Educated Jew from the Perspective of Reform Judaism is by Michael Meyer, a historian of modern Judaism at Hebrew Union College.

5. Educated Jews: Common Elements is the work of Michael Rosenak, a philosopher of Jewish education at Hebrew University. (Rosenak is the only one of the six scholars whose academic field is precisely that of Jewish education.)

6. The Concept of the Educated Person: With Some Applications to Jewish Education was composed by Scheffler, another philosopher of education and a professor at Harvard University.

Part 3 includes an essay by Seymour Fox, one of the great 20th-century voices in Jewish education, on a topic that is both critical to the viability of this book and central to Fox's lifework. In The Art of Translation, Fox explores how one translates vision into practice. Anyone who knows of Fox's significant contributions to educational theory, Hebrew camping, the Hebrew University's School of Education, the various Melton projects, the Jerusalem Fellows, and other Mandel Foundation projects knows also that he has devoted his career to simultaneously stretching the imaginative borders of visionary thinking and grounding those wild ideas in solid institutions that make a difference.

The last essay in the book, by Marom, describes his attempt to transfer the vision discussion into an American day school. Here we see what the skeptic in all of us might easily have doubted: the ability to translate grand visionary thinking into the nitty-gritty of everyday educational decisions.

In terms of content, the six essays by the individual scholars are of the highest quality. Asking a Twersky or a Greenberg to cogitate on the goals of an ideal Jewish education is an invitation to a pedagogic banquet of many sumptuous courses. Any educator who is comfortable in the world-view of Meyer (Reform), Brinker (Israeli secular), or Rosenak (religious Zionist) will identify with the respective vision and learn at the feet of these powerful thinkers. That, however, is just the beginning. Each one of us has the opportunity to compare these contrasting views and to search for surprises – moments when an unexpected opinion rises to the surface. These are not unidimensional scholars, and there exists in each essay an internal pluralism that is refreshing and challenging (possibly threatening to some).

> 'The voices of women would have been welcome'

The format of the book is, in itself, an instructive bit of meta-curriculum. Lining up six diverse thinkers and having them interact over many sessions on their respective visions is a lesson for all of us in pluralism and its benefits. In this case, no one was asked to compromise his own ideological position, but there is no doubt that the very presence of other authentic stances in the same room had its effect.

Another aspect of the technique also added to the dynamics of the deliberation. After each essay there is a supplement, which forces the particular scholar (and the reader) to revisit his dream in light of the other competing visions. This is a lesson in empathy and deep deliberation; an antidote to indoctrination.

If I were to fantasize about what else could have been part of this book, it would be the missing thinkers. The voices of women would have been welcome, given the large role that women have in education. A vision from the haredi world would have been illuminating. And we can only imagine what visions could have been supplied by great minds no longer with us – Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik, Abraham Joshua Heschel, Nechama Leibowitz, the Lubavitcher Rebbe and others.

As difficult as it is to limit myself to two selections, I will conclude by giving you two quotations from the book, which, I hope, will tempt you into reading this visionary collection.

'The revitalization of Jewish life'

Meyer ends his supplement with the following: "Whatever the outcome, whatever forms Jewish identity may take in the near or long term, to be a Jew vigorously in the modern world will continue to mean confronting new external enticements, sorting them out, and seeking to integrate those that do not contradict the fundamental principles of the Jewish tradition. It will also continue to mean coping with hostility in such a way as to prevent it from misshaping Jewishness either through the internalization of negative stereotypes or through allowing memory of persecutions past and fear of persecutions in the future to become the exclusive, cheerless content of Judaism. Mostly, I trust, Jewishness will focus in the future, as in the past, on Zion. For Zion not only represents Jewish origins and Jewish unity. It is also the symbol of that Redemption which orients Jewish identity to its highest goal and gives it intrinsic meaning."

Fox lists three assumptions about visioning at the outset of his essay. The first is that vision makes a difference, and that differing visions result in different kinds of Jewish education.

The second assumption is that for these visions, or any others, to be implemented, they need to include an understanding of the real-life settings – schools, community centres, adult education programs, and summer camps – where education takes place.

"Finally, a thoughtful, compelling vision can not only improve existing institutions; it can lead to the invention of new ones. Such a vision can galvanize the will of the community and its leaders, ignite the creativity of teachers, hearten parents, and motivate gifted people to invest their talent and passion in the revitalization of Jewish life."

Seymour Epstein is the executive director of the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education in Toronto.

Summertime vignettes of Israel

By DON CARR, Q.C.

Jerusalem. A fifth Israeli grandchild is born to us. Yael Hadass Feld, named on Shabbat in a shul in Ramot, where the women's section is a six-by-four-foot area behind a five-foot-high wooden mechitzah. A wonderful celebratory seudah shlishit at our children's home with a collection of family, olim from Canada, the United States, Switzerland and several sabras.

We join a UJA mission from Toronto led by Chuck Winograd and Robert Harlang for a couple of days. Most memorable is a review, by helicopter, of the seam line between Israel and the disputed territories alongside Kalkilya (Arab), Kfar Saba and Ranana (Jewish), Tulkarm (Arab) and Netanya (Jewish). Only from that vantage point is there vivid reconfirmation of the proximity of hostile Arab towns to those within Israel and the virtually indefensible sliver of pre-1967 Israeli territory inland from the Mediterranean to those Arab towns.

The security fence – so frequently referred to in the North American media and by the Arabs as "the wall" – and likened to the one that separated east and west Berlin. Out of the planned 769 kilometres, only 10 per cent of it will be a wall. The rest is a protective electronic fence. As for those portions that are, indeed, a wall – they run only alongside historically aggressive Arab towns and villages where, without it, random sniper fire is bound to shatter any period of quiet.

On the ground, driving along the highway adjacent to the wall, one is reminded of the sound barriers erected along the 401 in Toronto – although those were designed for different reasons.

The recent decision of the Israel Supreme Court requiring a change in the location of the barrier at certain places (but accepting the principle of the barrier), as disappointing as it may be to many Israelis, shows, once again, that Israel is the only country in the Middle East where the rule of law applies. The judgment of the court is an example of democracy in action.

Here are the closing paragraphs of the judgment: "Our task is difficult. We are members of Israeli society. Although we are sometimes in an ivory tower, that tower is in the heart of Jerusalem, which is not infrequently struck by ruthless terror. We are aware of the killing and destruction wrought by terror against the state and its citizens. As any other Israelis, we, too, recognize the need to defend the country and its citizens against the wounds inflicted by terror. We are aware that in the short term, this judgment will not make the state's struggle against those rising up against it easier. But we are judges. When we sit in judgment, we are subject to judgment. We act according to our best conscience and understanding. Regarding the state's struggle against the terror that rises up against it, we are convinced that at the end of the day, a struggle according to the law will strengthen her power and her spirit…

"Only a separation fence built on a base of law will grant security to the state and its citizens. Only a separation route based on the path of law will lead the state to the security so yearned for."

The world, however, is not interested in terror against Israelis, nor their right to defend themselves. Thus the International Court of Justice, an arm of the United Nations that is controlled by states inimical to the very existence of Israel, gave its opinion that "the wall" (its term) was illegal and should be removed totally. Adopting that opinion, the General Assembly of the UN, not unexpectedly, demanded the dismantling of the barrier.

But Israel will not desist; its actions will be governed by the rule of law, as interpreted by the only independent court with jurisdiction – the Supreme Court of Israel.

Some economic benefits of the Birthright Israel youth program for Israel since the program's inception: more than 190,000 workdays for Israelis; 206,000 hotel rooms used; and nearly 18,000 bus tours. The program's contribution to Israel's economy is more than $109 million (all figures US), with restaurant and café revenue accounting for more than $11 million. Payment for hiring buses was more than $5 million, and private purchases by the program's participants accounted for $19 million.

'The sole democracy in the M.E.'

A jewel in the crown of Israel's many museums is the too-often-neglected Bible Lands Museum in Jerusalem.

The brainchild and passion of the late Elie Borowski, who spent many years in Toronto, the museum has a permanent display of biblical and pre-biblical artifacts and a direct connection with Toronto. The bulk of the items on display are owned by and are on permanent loan from the Land of Biblical Archaeology Foundation, a Canadian charity.

Located across from the Israel Museum, the Bible Lands Museum also holds fascinating temporary exhibits, such as the current one, "Dragons, Monsters and Fabulous Beasts," a rich array of fantastic creatures from antiquity. Why missions and tourists from Canada do not make this exquisite, modern institution – the home of perhaps the largest collection of Mesopotamian seals in the world – a must on their itineraries – defies logic.

Israel's valid and powerful linkage, as the sole democracy in the Middle East, to other democracies across the world suffers terribly from the abysmal failure of Israeli hasbara (information).

This is no new phenomenon. It has existed for years. A former minister of foreign affairs at one time even disbanded the Hasbara Department of the Foreign Ministry. Now co-ordinated by Gidon Meir, who spent his early years in the Ottawa embassy, the department still does not understand that the job of presenting Israel to the North American, English-speaking public must be in the hands of those who speak our language with ease.

It is beyond belief that after so many years, Israel's message is transmitted by those with poor command of the language, while spokespersons such as former consul general Alon Pincus from New York, the Foreign Ministry's Dore Gold and Benjamin Netanyahu are rarely heard and seen.

Hold on! There is a rumour that Hebrew University, in co-operation with the Foreign Ministry, may soon be running a post-BA course on diplomacy and hasbara. It cannot be too soon.

The plumbing in the building housing our ground-floor apartment has passed its time of usefulness. Every so often, a little leak develops in the kitchen. But only the bubbling of damp plaster at the base of a wall gives it away.

We called the insurance company for their designated contractor to fix everything. The Levantine nature of part of the service industry in Israel now springs into action.

First comes a plumber. With a metal detector, he locates the pipes in the wall and under the floor tiles. With a practised eye, he compares the location with the pipes running just below the basement ceiling. He has to remove a large built-in kitchen cupboard. A pipe is under the floor beneath it.

He starts to hammer holes in the walls and shatter floor tiles. Bits of stone and showers of sand fly everywhere. Under the sand, beneath the tiles, he locates the leak, scoops out the sand with an old trowel, replaces the broken cast-iron pipe with one made of hard plastic.

But there must be more! Again, the hammer goes to work. Another leak – this time in the heating system. More plaster and rubble crumble and fly. Another old rusted pipe is removed and replaced

His work is done. He uses our broom and our dustpan to clean up. What about filling in the gaping holes in the walls and replacing the shattered floor tiles? Someone else will do that. We must call the company for a date.

For days, we step gingerly around the open floor at our doorway. The contractor assigns a date and two workers appear. Their job is solely to fill in the holes in the wall with rough cement and lay replacement floor tiles that we, fortunately, have on hand. What about plastering, painting and replacing the cupboard? Have patience! Those jobs are done by others. When the cement is dry – they say three weeks – they will set a date for the plasterer to come.

But we will be back in Toronto! A kind friend offers to come to our apartment at the appropriate time, let the plasterer in and wait until he is finished. Then another date will be set for a painter and a further date for someone to replace the cupboard. If all is completed by the time we return, it will be yet another Israeli miracle.

The dead-end street leading to the small square in front of our apartment building has just been designated as private parking, for use only by the residents of the adjacent buildings. None of the buildings has a parking garage.

To park anywhere in this area, a permit must be displayed on the car's windshield. The permit is issued by the City of Jerusalem. As we rent a car for our visits, we need a permit.

But wait! Despite proof of ownership of our apartment, a copy of our rental agreement and a copy of my passport, no permit can be given. Why? The clerk tells us that permits are only issued for the car that you own (on proof of ownership), or, if your rental agreement is for at least three months.

We ask to see the "boss." Same answer.

Where do I park? He tells me that I should park on the main street up the hill and pay for metered parking. Absurd, I say! Can you imagine me running up there every hour to deposit yet more money? Sorry, no permit!

I ask, what if one owned a car, but it required service and one rented a car for a few days? Sorry, no permit! What if one is a permanent resident, does not own a car, but decides to rent one for, say, two months? Sorry, no permit!

We arrive at a "compromise." I should park in front of our building, collect all of the tickets that I will surely get (at least two a day) and at the end of our visit, deliver all of them to his office with a sworn statement as to the ownership of the apartment, rental of the car and a copy of my passport. The tickets will then be cancelled.

Is there no other way to save the time and expense of having the parking police issue the tickets daily and for me to avoid going through this ridiculous process? No!

A visit to the city's ombudsman, who happens to be from Toronto, is to no avail. He cannot persuade the parking authorities to do otherwise. A letter to a higher municipal official yields nothing.

So much for local government flexibility and concern.

Don Carr is a lawyer, community acitivist and the president of The Canadian Jewish News.

Birthright Israel a huge success

Israeli Minister for Diaspora Affairs Natan Sharansky and Charles Bronfman, one of the founding Birthright Israel philanthropists, greet a new group of youngsters who arrived under the auspices of the innovative and successful program. More than 11,000 Diaspora youth were slated to visit Israel this year via Birthright.

Israel helps troubled Jewish youth from Toronto

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

Zachery Nussbaum was kicked out of his house at the age of 14. His father, a rabbi in Toronto, asked Nussbaum to leave after he dropped out of yeshiva and refused to return to school.

"Yeshiva was a horrible experience for me. I was beaten by the other kids and picked on," says the dark-eyed 18-year-old. "So, I turned away. I lost all faith in Judaism and God and I started doing really bad stuff and hanging out with really bad people."

Since he left home, Nussbaum has couch-surfed across Toronto. "Nobody would take me in," he says. "My grandparents wouldn't even take me in. I was homeless."

Nussbaum stands at the Western Wall, among a group of 11 Jewish youth aged 17 to 24 from Toronto whose lives, like his, have included drug abuse, homelessness, foster care, group homes, shelters, rehabilitation facilities, dire school records, trouble with the law or problems with parents.

When Toronto-based Jewish Agency aliyah counsellor Gadi Anavi found out about the existence of these young people last winter through social worker Lillian Freedman, he thought that a two-week trip to Israel would be just the solution to get them onto the right path. The pair started to gather funding from the Jewish Agency and private philanthropists and "Israel Beats the Streets" was born.

'UJA Federation of Greater Toronto swooped in with a $30,000 Cdn grant'

Everything was set. Then, two weeks before the group was set to depart, one major philanthropic source fell through and the trip was in danger of cancellation.

That's when the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto swooped in with a $30,000 Cdn grant. After that, Momo Lifshitz, president of Oranim Educational Initiatives, agreed to supply the itinerary and tour guide; UIA Federations Canada pledged their support; and Toronto social workers Richard Coleman and Hindy Goldblum agreed to chaperone the group.

As the tearful group stood facing the Wall on the last day of their trip (the first site they visited after their arrival on Aug. 13), it was evident that Anavi couldn't have been more right about Israel helping them.

"In Toronto, I couldn't find a home," says Nussbaum. "And that's exactly what I found here. I feel such a strong connection; I feel so close to this country and to the people that live here. It makes me feel so strongly; I don't know how to express my feelings. I love it here.

"This has been the most unbelievable experience of my life," he adds. "I know that everybody is special in their own way, but you're looking at the bad special turning into the good special."

Joseph Anidjar is another such special person. The 21-year-old has been on his own since he was 18, when he had a falling out with his mother and stepfather, who currently reside in New Brunswick. "I had a rough childhood, growing up with my brother and my mom," he says, adding that since he was seven years old, when his parents divorced, he made a lot of mistakes.

"I did a few things that I regret and that have made my relationship with my parents not as good.

"Bit by bit, it's getting better. But, it takes time to build the respect and trust and I realize that now."

Although he says he loves his grandmother, with whom he lives in Toronto, it has not always been easy for them to get along. "It's been a little rough for me. We live in a small apartment and I lead a life that is totally opposite from hers. She's an 83-year-old woman and I'm a 21-year-old man. I like to have fun and she thinks I have to be in at 10 p.m. I don't deal well with that."

According to Anidjar, the trip to Israel has provided him with coping techniques that he thinks will be helpful. "Being here has totally changed my outlook on the way I handle people. I think it will be a lot better [when I get home]," he says.

"This trip opened my eyes to the things I want to do in my life. It has made me want to go back home and make my life what I want it to be."

The trip also opened a spiritual door to Anidjar. "I have been away from Judaism for a long time. But I feel spiritual here," he says, adding that on the first day of the trip, he didn't feel ready to put messages into the Wall, but by the last day, he felt comfortable enough to leave three prayer notes behind. "There were three things I really wanted to say and I'm glad that I did," he says. "I feel a lot better now."

"Coming here made me remember the happy person I used to be," he says, adding that he even looked in the mirror at one of the hotels and said to himself, I'm back! I'm smiling all the time.

"I want that to continue," he says. "I have a mindset of what I need to do now, and I think after I come back from Israel, my life is going to change."

Karen, 20, (who wanted her last name withheld) was following in her mother's footsteps when she started taking drugs, including heroin and cocaine, at the age of 12, but she was already on the road to change when she got to Israel.

"There were a lot of drugs and a lot of other extracurricular activities that used to be involved in my life," she says. She has been clean for the last 3½ months, ever since she left Toronto on a two-month trip to Kenya, during which she was drug free. "I tried to get help. I went to a lot of groups, I went to a detox centre and I ran away. I tried a lot of things, but nothing worked.

"In the end, I did it on my own. I decided that I have so much more to live for and I asked myself 'why am I doing this?'" she says. "I didn't have a choice. I had to do it for myself because if I didn't, I'd be dead."

For her, coming to Israel with the group was an opportunity to continue her rehabilitation by helping others in the same situation. "I wanted to share my experience with other people and try to help them through what they're going through, 'cause I've already beaten that."

'This trip was a very spiritual experience'

According to Coleman, an addictions specialist and the former co-ordinator of the alternative sentencing program, the Toronto Drug Treatment Court, hard-drug use among youth in Karen's age group is not so uncommon. "What we're seeing in the age group 15 to 25 is heroin, cocaine, methamphetamines and club drugs like ecstasy and 3TC," he says.

Coleman says drug use has been a significant part of the lifestyle of some of the young people in the group that visited Israel. "Some of them come from a background that has been difficult because they have parents that use drugs; parents with mental illnesses; or parents that are heavy drinkers and are abusive," he says. "There are some who are unsure as to whether they will be using drugs again when they return. That's a decision that they are going to have to make.

"But, without exception, there has been a lot of learning going on and by and large, it has been a very rewarding trip for them. It has given them a chance to look at their lives in Toronto from a different perspective, and I think for some of them, they are going to make big changes as a result of this."

Goldblum, a family counsellor who specializes in addictions, mental health, homelessness, marginalized people and welfare, agrees. "Up until now, these kids have had a very small framework of reality," she says. "Coming outside of that reality and being in Israel has given them the ability to see that there is something greater outside of themselves and whatever their situation is in Toronto."

But the pilot group only represents a small fraction of homeless Jewish youth in Toronto. Coleman says it's difficult to ascertain accurate numbers, since most Jews who use homeless shelters and drug rehabilitation facilities don't identify themselves as Jews. Still, he estimates the count at around 1,000 in the city and up to tens of thousands across the country.

"Jewish youth are definitely underrepresented, relative to the percentage of Jews within the greater population," he says. "But they are out there."

According to a 2002 Jewish Community Study of New York, released last summer by the UJA Federation there, the same is true for the United States. Out of 1.4 million Jews in New York alone, 244,000 live below the poverty line.

That's why Michael Landsberg, executive director of the Israel Aliyah Center in New York, says he wants the "Israel Beats the Streets" pilot program to become a North American model. "In January 2003, when I started to work in New York, I realized that the legend that all North American Jews are rich is not true," he says.

"There is a strategy here to work with poor and underprivileged populations. I don't think we should only deal with them if they are from Russia, Argentina and Ethiopia. There are hundreds of thousands of Jews in North America who live in similar circumstances. It's just that no one wants to admit it."

Landsberg is careful to clarify that he is referring to a specific population. "It's not about bringing all of the homeless, criminals and drug addicts in North America to Israel," he says. "It's about bringing Jewish youth and other people who are solid, who can make it and who are on their way to a new life. There are those Jews who are in a bad situation, and if we give them a hand, we can pull them out of the swamp and help them to open a new page in a new society."

"The success of the group from Toronto should serve as a model for other North American communities."

Successful it was. "Whether these kids end up coming to live in Israel or staying in Toronto, they will be active in the Jewish community," says Laura Kindler, a representative from the Toronto UJA Federation, with confidence. "They are not the same people they were before they came."

Participant Rachel Danzinger, 18, is a living testament to this truth. "I have decided that I would like to try to be more close to the religion, in terms of telling people that I'm Jewish, rather than hiding it or trying to steer away from it; celebrating the holidays; going to synagogue once in a while; cooking dinners on Shabbat; lighting candles; saying Kiddush – little things that I feel I want to do now," says Danzinger, who has been taking welfare and living on her own since she was 16.

"This trip was a very spiritual experience. It's not something that when I go back to Toronto, I'm going to sit and let absorb and then realize. I realize what I am going through right now," she says. "I'm feeling it while I'm here. I am just so happy that I got the chance to come."

The potential for aliyah among members of the group is also great. According to Goldblum, all of the youth on the trip said that they want to return to Israel. The trick, she says, is to strike while the iron is hot. "They are very enthusiastic and now is a good time to build on that, to keep them motivated."

Nussbaum is definitely interested in pursuing the idea. "I have to go back to Toronto and settle my stuff there," he says in reference to his completion of high school next year. "But I most certainly want to come back, and now that I know it's an option for me, I definitely will."

Danzinger is also committed to the idea. "As soon as I finish high school next year, I see no reason why I shouldn't get myself back into this country," she says. "I want to come back here, learn the language and live on a kibbutz."

Anidjar already has a six-month plan in place. "I want to return to go to the army," he says. "I'm very serious about that, because I appreciate everything that Israel has done for me as a Jewish person and I feel the need to give a little bit of that back."

The Jews of Iraq: long and tortuous history

By DAVID W. S. YUDIN

On June 28, two days earlier than planned, the coalition provisional authority transferred power to a new interim and sovereign Iraqi government.

Though the United States and its allies continue to maintain a very strong military presence in Iraq, and will undoubtedly wield an enormous amount of influence, the significance of the June 28 transfer of power should not be underestimated.

For the first time since Saddam Hussein became president in 1978, Iraq is being ruled by a government concerned with the interests of the Iraqi people.

Moreover, the government is representative of the diverse ethnicities and cultures in Iraq. It is led by a Shiite president, a Shiite prime minister and Kurdish and Sunni vice-presidents.

Other cultural groups are also represented, and the new government has pledged to make human rights a high priority. However, one "group" that is not represented is the Jewish community of Iraq.

With only 18 individuals, the Jewish community can no longer be considered an official group. It is therefore hardly surprising that the community is not represented in the new regime. Nevertheless, with a long and torturous history in Iraq, the voices of the departed Jews need to be heard.

Prior to Iraq's independence in 1932, there were approximately 150,000 Jews in Iraq – a far cry from the current 18.

While one often hears of the crimes committed by Saddam Hussein, the history of Iraq's Jews – of which most people know little – and the crimes perpetrated against them started well before him.

The story begins over 2,500 years ago in 586 BCE, when Nebuchadnezzar, the king of the Babylonian Empire, conquered Jerusalem and Judah, destroyed the First Temple and took the Jews as captives to Babylon.

Many Iraqis are quick to point out that the Iraqi Jewish community, before its demise, was the oldest continuous Jewish community in the world, outside of Israel. Most other Diaspora communities consist of descendants of the exile that followed the destruction of the Second Temple in Jerusalem in 70 CE.

Iraqi Jews, who like to be referred to as Babylonian Jews, take pride in the fact that Babylon was the birthplace of the Talmud, which is the main source of recorded biblical interpretation.

In modern times, the Iraqi Jewish community was known as one of the most enlightened and prosperous Jewish communities. It blossomed with the demise of the Ottoman Empire and the rise of the British Empire. The British introduced the concepts of human rights and equality, which had an immediate positive impact on Jews and other minorities.

Only 18 individuals in the Jewish community today

With the establishment of the Kingdom of Iraq in 1921, many Iraqi Jews became prominent members of the larger society. The first finance minister, a Jew named Heskel Sasson, was in large part responsible for the enormous oil wealth that Iraq accumulated during the 20th century. This was prior to UN sanctions imposed after the Gulf War. When Sasson negotiated the sale of Iraq's oil to the British-based Turkish Oil Company, he ensured that Iraq be paid in gold currency and not in pounds sterling. When the pound sterling went off the gold standard, Iraq profited greatly from its oil revenues.

On a personal note, my grandfather, Saleh Kahtan, was the legal advisor to the Ministry of Finance and subsequently became a member of Parliament.

The demise of Iraq's Jewish community began after the death of liberal King Faisal in 1933. The first step was the legislation of anti-Jewish measures, including restrictions preventing Jews from entering the civil service and receiving public education.

The situation deteriorated drastically in the 1930s when Nazi ideology began to seep into Iraq. The German ambassador to Iraq, Fritz Grobba, began to broadcast Radio Berlin in Arabic and distribute daily excerpts from Hitler's Mein Kampf in a popular Iraqi newspaper.

The culmination of all this was the 1941 coup that resulted in pro-Nazi Rashid Ali coming to power in Iraq. The consequence of this Nazi influence and the rise of nationalism and anti-Semitism in Iraq was the Farhud of 1941.

The Farhud was a pogrom that lasted two days and nights. Mobs of Iraqis, civilians and police, sacked and pillaged the Jewish area of Baghdad, killing at least 150, robbing, raping, maiming and injuring hundreds of others. Among Iraqi Jews, the Farhud is known as the Kristallnacht of the Middle East, presaging the expulsion of close to one million Jews from most of the Arab countries in the Middle East.

When the situation for Jews in Iraq began to deteriorate, Jews were forbidden to set foot outside the country and were essentially held hostage until they were able to escape.

In 1950, the travel restrictions were lifted and Jews were allowed to leave on the condition that they renounce their citizenship. From 1950 to 1951 approximately 125,000 Jews left Iraq as stateless persons in an airlift rescue organized by Israel. Iraq then confiscated all the property of those Jews, who were not allowed to take with them much more than some clothes to wear.

For the Jews who stayed in Iraq, the future included many more hardships. Travel outside the country was once again forbidden and persecution became particularly acute with the Baathist revolution in 1968 and Saddam Hussein's rise to power.

In 1969, nine Jews were hanged, convicted of being "American and Zionist spies" and "poisoning the water wells." The false nature of these charges is evident from the lumping together of espionage charges with the notoriously anti-Semitic medieval charge imported from Europe, alleging Jewish responsibility for disease through the poisoning of water wells.

The destruction of Iraq's Jewish community was complete

It is inconceivable that Jews would have even had the opportunity to spy, because since 1967 all telephone connections to Jewish residences had been cut, Jews were forbidden from venturing beyond a certain distance from their homes and the community itself was subjected to round-the-clock surveillance.

With much fanfare and publicity, the bodies were left to hang all day in Baghdad Square, and the day was even declared a national holiday. Some 500,000 people came to celebrate the hangings.

Saddam Hussein, the chief of the National Security Bureau of the Revolutionary Command Council, addressed the crowd in front of television crews and newspaper reporters.

It did not take much time for Saddam to intimidate and harass the approximate 5,000 Jews who remained in Iraq in the 1960s, until they left the country using risky and dangerous means to escape.

On this matter, Saddam was influenced by his uncle and mentor, Khairallah Tulfah, whose pamphlet, Three Whom God Should Not Have Created: Persians, Jews and Flies Saddam had published in 1981 after he became president and was waging war on Iran.

The destruction of Iraq's Jewish community was complete. Prior to the war, the once proud, prosperous and vibrant 2,500-year-old and 150,000-person-strong community had dwindled to 38 individual, poor and isolated souls.

Since the end of the war, the community has shrunk to 18 people. This is a tragedy both for the victims, as well as for the entire nation of Iraq whose cultural landscape has been forever changed.

At one point, Baghdad was said to have been 35 per cent Jewish, with most shops reported to have been closed on the Jewish Sabbath. One can hardly begin to imagine how the face of this city changed when it lost an entire cultural group equal to a third of its population.

Even in times of peace and prosperity,

Iraq must redress all the injustices

which will hopefully come soon, the Iraqi nation will be forever deprived of its original diversity, because of the damage and destruction brought upon it by its leaders.

Mohammed Zaki Khattab was the attorney for Jewish businessman Shafiq Ades, who was hanged in 1948 in front of his home in Basra after, in a show trial, being convicted of supplying Israel with arms. On the day of Ades' hanging, Khattab said, "A day will come when the Iraqi people will exculpate the innocence of Ades, the same as the French people exculpated the innocence of Dreyfus."

Youngsters from Iraq discover the new world of the fields of Israel.

It is my sincere hope that Khattab's words will now come true. If Iraqis are truly interested in establishing a real and healthy democracy, this democracy must also be a country capable of introspection and healing.

It should no longer be possible for Iraq to deny its history. Rather, Iraq must come to terms with and redress all the injustices that it has committed, including the false prosecution, discrimination, harassment, violence, exile and dispossession of its Jews.

Not only have Iraqi Jews suffered physical exile and the loss of their property, but the country has also denied and dismissed their suffering and excluded them from Iraqi history.

As a first step, therefore, the story of Iraq's Jewish community must be told and a true historical reckoning must occur within Iraq.

In addition, Iraqi Jews have rights to reparations for the confiscation of their property. Their exile from Iraq must also be addressed.

Only when Iraq comes to terms with its history, including the treatment of its Jews, can it return to its rightful place in history, as the cradle of civilization and pride of the Orient.

In this regard as well, Iraqi democracy can serve as an example to other Arab countries in the region whose Jews shared a similar fate to Iraq's Jews, and whose stories have also been erased.

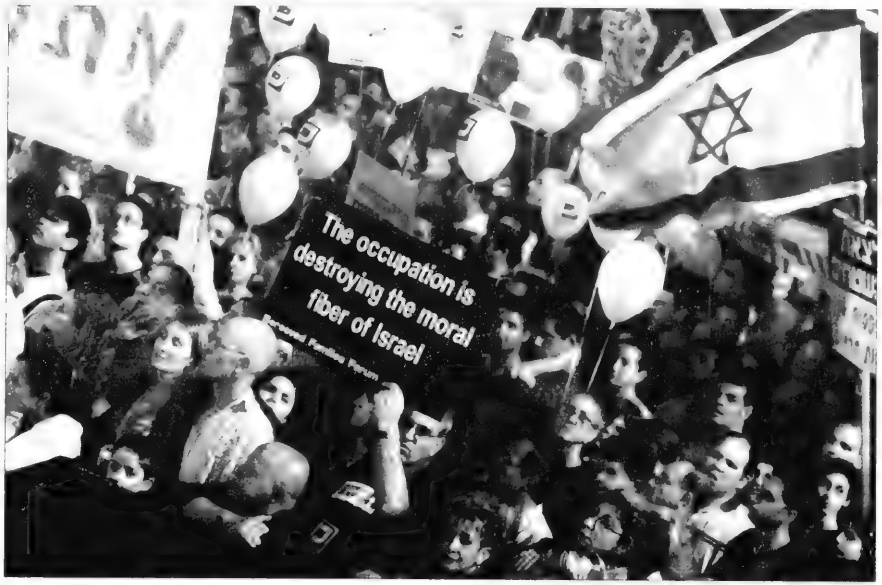
Anti-Semitism's signatures

Federal Justice Minister Irwin Cotler examines the burnt-out remnants of the library at the United Talmud Torahs in Montreal on the eve of Passover.

Anti-Semitic vandals over the past year did their ugly handiwork in Jewish cemeteries around the world. Here we see the results in New Zealand, immediately above, and in France.



Israelis rallied in large numbers for the government to withdraw from Gaza and from the West Bank.

5764: A year of pain and passion

By LESLIE SUSSER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

If the year 5764 could be summed up in one word, it would be disengagement.

After more than three years of inability to make progress on third-party proposals to end Palestinian violence or advance the road map peace plan, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon seized the initiative, announcing that Israel would withdraw unilaterally from the Gaza Strip and parts of the West Bank in order to "disengage" from the Palestinians.

Sharon's plan, first mooted last December and officially launched April 14, redefined the international agenda on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Despite his refusal to co-ordinate the plan with the Palestinian Authority, which he does not consider a credible negotiating partner, Sharon secured widespread international and regional support.

But the plan, which entails the evacuation of 21 Jewish settlements in Gaza and four in the West Bank, ran into fierce opposition from the settler movement and the Israeli right, and Israel's security services warned of the possibility of violent resistance.

In what threatened to be a serious debacle, Sharon's own Likud party rejected the plan in a party referendum. Sharon still managed to push it through his cabinet on June 7 – but only after firing two hawkish ministers from the National Union bloc and winning over three senior ministers from his own Likud party by ostensibly watering down the plan.

The amended plan provided for evacuation of settlements in four separate stages, with a fresh vote before each stage. The first vote was scheduled to be held by March 1, 2005, and Sharon said he intended to evacuate all settlements and army installations in Gaza by the end of 2005.

After initial skepticism, the Bush administration warmly welcomed Sharon's plan as a potentially historic turning point. At a White House meeting April 14, Sharon and President Bush exchanged letters endorsing the plan.

In his letter, Bush also endorsed two key Israeli positions for a final peace deal with the Palestinians: that it is "unrealistic" to expect Israel to return to the pre-1967 Green Line boundary with the West Bank, and that Palestinian refugees would have the right to return to a future State of Palestine, not to Israel.

In return for Israel's offer to withdraw from most of the areas conquered in 1967, Bush's letter seemed to guarantee American support on two of the most contentious issues in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict: that Israel would be able to retain large settlement blocs in the West Bank and that Israel's Jewish character would not be undermined by an influx of Arab refugees.

In late June, after the assurances were approved overwhelmingly by Congress, Sharon described the Bush letter as "one of the most important diplomatic achievements" in Israeli history.

The members of the international Quartet who formulated the road map – – the United States, European Union, United Nations and Russia – also expressed support for the disengagement plan, and offered to help rehabilitate the Gaza Strip after an Israeli withdrawal.

But after a July 5 meeting in Jerusalem with Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ahmed Qurei, Quartet representatives made it clear that the offer of aid was conditional on the Palestinians carrying out security and other reforms they had agreed to in the road map.

Concerned a post-withdrawal Gaza could become a hotbed of fundamentalist terrorism that could spill over into its territory, Egypt offered to play a stabilizing role. But the Egyptians, too, laid down conditions, insisting that the Palestinians unify their security forces under a single command, as envisaged in the road map.

That demand, together with unprecedented Palestinian riots over the summer against the corrupt regime of PA President Yasser Arafat, led to speculation that Arafat might soon be forced to hand power to a new generation of Palestinians willing to make peace with Israel.

Sharon's determination to carry out a major unilateral move came in the wake of the collapse of PA Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas' government in September 2003. The Israeli leader despaired of reaching any kind of agreement with the Palestinians and feared that Israel might be sucked into an indefinite occupation, leading to demands for the establishment of a binational Israeli-Palestinian state that soon would have an Arab majority.

'Moving unilaterally to separate'

By moving unilaterally to separate Israelis and Palestinians, Sharon hoped to create conditions for the two-state solution envisaged in the road map.

The plan, however, ran into fierce right-wing opposition. Settlers and hawks in Sharon's own Likud Party described the proposed withdrawal – without a cease-fire or any other Palestinian quid pro quo – as a "prize for terrorism."

To head off the opposition and secure Likud backing in the Knesset and cabinet, Sharon initiated a referendum of the full Likud party membership.

But the move backfired: On May 2, the party voted 60 per cent to 40 per cent against the disengagement plan.

The vote did not stop Sharon from amending the plan slightly and going ahead with it, but right-wing opponents accused him of riding roughshod over a democratic party decision, citing the party vote in an attempt to discredit the prime minister and his plan.

The Shin Bet security service suggested that right-wing extremists were gearing up to use violence to foil the evacuation, possibly by striking against Sharon or other cabinet ministers.

Politicians on both the left and right concurred that defiant settler statements and provocative rabbinical rulings against evacuation recalled the situation in the months preceding the 1995 assassination of prime minister Yitzhak Rabin.

On June 15, as his amended disengagement plan started taking shape, Sharon was cleared by Menachem Mazuz, Israel's new attorney general, of wrongdoing in the so-called Greek Island Affair, in which David Appel, a Likud activist and billionaire developer, was suspected of paying Sharon's son, Gilad, huge sums for work on the project in return for Sharon's help with Greek and Israeli authorities.

Sharon still faces possible criminal charges in an unrelated matter, over money his sons raised to pay back illegal campaign funding. Still, exoneration in the Greek Island Affair strengthened him politically at a crucial time.

Throughout the year, Palestinian terrorism continued to take Israeli lives, but the volume seemed to be decreasing. This was the case in Gaza, where Israel struck powerful blows against the leadership of the fundamentalist Hamas movement, assassinating its leader, Sheik Ahmed Yassin, on March 22, and his successor, Abdel Aziz Rantissi, less than a month later. Hamas threatened rivers of blood in retaliation, but the attacks never materialized, and it appeared that Israel's vigorous anti-terrorist moves had paid dividends.

The volume of Palestinian terrorism seemed to be decreasing

This was even truer on the West Bank. Figures released by the Israel Defence Forces showed that in the first six months of 2004, there had been only four successful suicide attacks emanating from the West Bank, compared to 17 in the same period in 2003. The IDF's Central Command ascribed the decline to army activities in West Bank cities, pinpoint intelligence and the erection of part of the security fence between Israel and the West Bank, which forced would-be terrorists to operate along fewer, longer and more easily monitored routes.

Despite its obvious security advantages, however, the fence proved controversial – at least outside Israel. On July 9, the United Nations' International Court of Justice ruled that the fence was illegal because it intruded in places into the West Bank – which the court deemed "Palestinian land" – and called on Israel to dismantle it.

Denouncing the ruling as biased and politically motivated, Israel argued that the court failed to take into account the basic reason for building the fence: Palestinian terrorism. Although the ruling was merely advisory and non- binding, the Palestinians welcomed it as a significant step in their campaign to turn Israel into an international pariah state.

Indeed, within two weeks they had turned it into a resolution at the UN General Assembly ordering Israel to dismantle the fence. Though the resolution also was non-binding, the overwhelming nature of the vote – including the unanimous support of an expanded European Union, raising the prospect of an unprecedented rupture in Israel's relations with Europe – served to further isolate the Jewish state on the world stage.

Israel's position in the region also was affected by fallout from the American war in Iraq, as well as the ongoing confrontation with the Palestinians. On Dec. 19, just days after the capture of Saddam Hussein, Libyan leader Col. Moammar Gadhafi announced his readiness to dismantle his weapons of mass destruction programs, which many believed were aimed primarily against Israel.

Signs that Israel's economy was emerging from a three-year slump

At the same time, the unrelenting clashes with Palestinian terrorism led to strains in Israel's strategic relationship with Turkey. Turkey's Islamist-led government accused Israel of state terrorism, though trade and military ties were not immediately affected.

In parallel with the decline in terrorism, there were signs that Israel's economy was emerging from a three-year slump. In the first quarter of 2004, GNP grew by an impressive 5.1 per cent, the business sector expanded by 7.2 per cent, private consumption rose 4.3 per cent, imports of goods and services increased by 25.6 per cent and exports were up by 35.6 per cent.

But the recovery failed to trickle down to the weaker socio-economic sectors: Despite the growth, unemployment reached a 12-year high of over 11 per cent. Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who won high marks from international economists for his handling of the economy, was accused by Israeli opponents of creating an economy for the rich.

The most devastating argument against Netanyahu was in the poverty statistics: Despite the economic upturn, 1.3 million Israelis, or one of every five citizens, including a third of Israeli children, still were living below the poverty line in 5764.

Redemption in a graveyard in Poland

By JACK GOLDFARB

Two summers ago, Anna Garczynska phoned me with startling news from her tiny village of Rytwiany, outside Staszow, Poland. Two skeletons had been found beneath a house undergoing reconstruction on Koscielna Street in Staszow.

Anna's son-in-law, Slawek, a Staszow policeman, had told her about the grim discovery. Her first thought was that maybe – just maybe – the skeletons might be the remains of any of my relatives lost in the Holocaust. The thought of this possibility gripped me with shock – and hope. Our family had lost 35 kin – uncles, aunts and cousins. To find any traces of them now, 60 years after they presumably perished in Belzec or Treblinka, would be nothing short of a miracle.

Anna's family and I have kept in close contact for the past 10 years, since I first met them when I began restoring the Jewish cemetery in Staszow. Her mother was Leokadia Kawalec, a Righteous Gentile honoured by Yad Vashem for helping to save eight Staszow Jews. Leokadia has never forgotten witnessing the death march of the 5,000 Staszow Jews as they were mercilessly driven from the town.

I thanked Anna for the phone call and asked her to keep me posted about the skeletons. Several days later, the Staszow police filed their report: the skeletons – that of a man of about 40 years old and a young teenager of uncertain gender – bore no signs of criminal violence. Their deaths occurred, most likely, during the years of Nazi occupation, from 1939 to 1944. The report surmised they died of starvation or suffocation under the house. With these details, the police were closing the case and preparing to dispose of the remains, in the local potter's field.

But the slim thread of hope that the skeletons could be those of my relatives, and the strong likelihood that the two unfortunate souls were Jewish persons in hiding under the house, motivated me to intervene. I contacted the Staszow police and insisted that DNA tests be made.

The local forensic physician agreed to my request and, after Rabbi Michael Schudrich, chief rabbi of Poland, gave his halachic sanction (Jewish law normally forbids "mutilation" of human remains), Dr. Grosicki removed several teeth from the skeletons.

I had already asked the good people of the biology department at University College, London, whether they could do the genetic testing for me. (I had once participated in their genetic study of Cohanim). Their reply was that if the London beit din also approved – as the skeletons were presumed to be of Jewish persons – the lab would do the work and, generously, waive any fees.

I dared to hope that these two skeletons could be that of my Uncle Aron (Wolman) and one of his children. He was my mother's brother, the youngest of nine siblings. He had had two children – a 14-year-old son, Chaskell, and a 10-year-old daughter, Yehudit. I never knew definitively what fate befell them.

Born in the United States, I had never personally known any of my Staszow relatives. But the fascinating stories and characteristics of many of them, as told by my parents, made them as real as if they had sat around our own dining table as I grew up in west Philadelphia

My Uncle Aron had been a "war hero" who, after serving several years conscripted in the Russian czar's army, managed to escape (in the chaos of the Russian Revolution) and trek hundreds of miles home, after the family thought he had surely been killed in battle. After the Holocaust, the story that had reached us in Philadelphia was that when the deportation train carrying the Staszow Jews had slowed for a curve, my uncle, daring and impulsive, had leaped from the cattle car, but had been shot dead by the Gestapo guards on the roof.

Although Uncle Aron and one of his children matched closest to the skeletons' estimated ages, others of my lost relatives also fitted those age groups. I swabbed the inside of my cheek and sent my DNA sample off to the London University laboratory.

The wait for results was a long one. The lab was busy and it took almost two years. When the results finally arrived, the answer was negative; the skeletons were not my kin.

Nevertheless, I felt obliged to give these two anonymous mortals a decent burial. The two sets of remains had been in the custody of the Staszow Town Hospital for those two years.

Together with a friend, Andrzej Wawrylak, a member of the Staszow Town Council, I went to the hospital morgue and presented the document requesting the release of the skeletons to me for burial.

'You know what? You bury the skeletons!'

The clerks on duty calculated the arithmetic on paper and came up with the news that I owed exactly 38,000 Polish zlotys (about $800 US). My abrupt question, "For what?" elicited the reply, "For refrigeration and storage of human remains for two years – including cost of electricity."

My impulse reaction was to respond with, "You know what? You bury the skeletons!"

But then I thought – whoever these tragic people were and for whatever they had suffered, they did not deserve to be indecorously cast into a nameless grave in potter's field, their identity lost forever.

But 38,000 zlotys also seemed extortionate.

Mr. Wawrylak stepped into the breach. He spoke on the phone to the director of the morgue, asserting that I would not pay the sum demanded.

"How much will he pay?" the director asked.

I offered $200 and the "deal" was quickly sealed. The money was "donated" to the hospital. A sad comment on what amounted to a repugnant ransoming of the dead.

We transported the skeletons to the cemetery and made arrangements for the digging of a grave. But, according to Jewish law, no human remains could be knowingly disturbed by the burial of another.

To help with that, Alex Wasowicz, the young assistant to Rabbi Schudrich, had travelled the 250 kilometres from Warsaw to Staszow. Alex had brought along two hollow aluminum prongs that he used as "divining rods" to determine a place in this 183-year-old cemetery where no one else was buried.

As Alex stalked about the burial ground with his two aluminum rods, they continually crossed over each other, indicating the presence of human remains. Under an overhead canopy of tall acacia trees, he suddenly stopped in his tracks. "A very heavy presence here," he said quietly. "Something unusual…" The prongs had locked firmly on to each other.

Next November we will honour them with prayers and a memorial stone

And then I knew.

On that fateful day in November 1942 when the Jews of Staszow stood in long rows in the town square awaiting their fate, the Nazis and their Lithuanian mercenaries shot dead dozens of people at random to intimidate the massed community. Later, a group of able-bodied Jewish men were ordered to hastily bury the victims in a mass grave in the cemetery. The men were warned not to speak to one another as they went about their gruesome task.

But one of those gravediggers, Mory Rosenzweig, survived the war. When he visited me in New York many years ago, he told me he had managed to sink an iron pipe in the ground to mark the site of the mass grave. Rosenzweig drew me a rough map indicating its location.

On my frequent trips to Staszow, I searched in vain for the iron pipe.

Nor was Mory's map, salvaged from his memory 50 years later, helpful. Time and the elements had altered the terrain. No landmark grove of trees existed. A cluster of withered stumps may or may not have been a vanished grove.

After Alex's discovery, I pored over the dog-eared map once more. Several clues this time seemed to confirm his "divining" evidence – vestigial traces of an eroded hillock and remnants of a crumbling stone wall.

I asked Alex to double-check the site with the aluminum prongs. He did.

No question about it, he said, this is the "heaviest" site in the cemetery.

Sixty years later, we have obviously found these martyred townspeople and next November we will honour them with prayers and a memorial stone.

For me, they are not all nameless victims. In this grave lies my blind Uncle Herszel, who emerged from his hiding place on that fateful day to mournfully chant biblical verses until a Lithuanian mercenary murdered this gentle soul with a bullet through his head.

And in this grave lies my heroic aunt, Chava Malkeles, a gutsy septuagenarian, who before they shot her, defiantly shouted to the Germans that the Jews, who had survived all their oppressors throughout history, would ultimately triumph over Hitler, too.

We lowered the two skeletons found in Koscielna Street, wrapped in prayer shawls, into the clayish earth. At the edge of the narrow pit offering these two anonymous souls a permanent resting place at last, we recited the time-hallowed words of the Kaddish prayer… "V'yitkadash shmai rabbah…"

Struggle against anti-Semitism far from over

By TIDHAR WALD
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

"One shouldn't say things like that," says film director Claude Lanzmann, nodding toward the July issue of Liberation lying on his desk. The newspaper featured Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's appeal to French Jews to immigrate to Israel because of "wild anti-Semitism" in France.

"I think that Sharon's remarks are inappropriate. They can only further increase tension. Besides, the Jews won't leave France – I mean, they will if anti-Semites start killing them – but in any case, I really don't think that this was the right time to say it."

Claude Lanzmann

Like most Jewish intellectuals in France since the outbreak of the intifadah four years ago, Lanzmann, 79, is willing to add his name to any petition, article or demonstration against anti-Semitic acts in France. After all, he devoted his life and his most famous cinematic work, the film Shoah, to trying to ensure that what happened will never again happen. However, recent years have taught him that the struggle is far from over.

His preoccupation with the fight against anti-Semitism is evident from the thousands of books in his office that deal with the Holocaust, anti-Semitism, Judaism, racism and xenophobia. He has an official stamp of approval in the dozens of honorary degrees, medals and prizes he has been awarded all over the world.

Alongside the personal photographs with his grandchildren, wife and close friends Simone Signoret and Jean Paul Sartre are photographs of handshakes and ceremonies with heads of state and world leaders.

The rise of anti-Semitism in France in recent years spurred Lanzmann to distribute his film to anyone willing to see it. Three years ago, the French Ministry of Education sponsored a DVD release of the film with select excepts from Shoah, in addition to lesson plans and an analysis of the film.

However, Lanzmann discovered that most of the copies were not used and many of those sent to schools were never shown to students. Lanzmann personally appealed to the ministers of education who have served since the release of the disk. Finally, he decided to initiate guided screenings of the film himself.

In the past three years, he has shown excerpts of the film to different groups, from high school students in Paris' wealthier neighbourhoods to inmates of prisons. "The encounter with the prisoners was supposed to last two hours," he recalls, "but ultimately it took the whole day. They were riveted and did not want to leave the room even to have lunch."

Very sad about the new wave

He has encountered moving responses in schools, too. "The students responded with total shock," he relates. "Some of them burst into tears, and in one high school, a girl fainted. It cannot be compared to learning from books. To see Shoah is a formative experience."

Since most of the anti-Semitic incidents in France are associated with people of North African extraction who live in the poorest neighborhoods of Paris and its suburbs, Lanzmann decided to visit the St. Dennis area. It has the highest percentage of immigrants in the Paris suburbs and a high incidence of violent crime and anti-Semitic attacks.

The film was shown in a high school where most of the students are the children of poor immigrants living in tiny apartments in huge, imposing concrete towers. "After each anti-Semitic incident," says Lanzmann, "the government responds with a conditioned reflex – an emergency meeting of all the ministers for a discussion on the question of how to fight anti-Semitism. And what happens afterward?"

He sighs and continues, "In that high school, all the students are children of immigrants of North African or Arab extraction. But the real problem is not the students, but the teachers. They have to be trained to educate against anti-Semitism, and instructed on how to teach a film like Shoah, what to focus on and how to trigger a debate."

At the beginning of the encounter, he says he gave the students the context of the scene that they were about to see, which takes place about 4½ hours into the film. "I explained to them that Shoah is not a movie about survival or the survivors," he says, "but about death and the dead. About exterminating people with gas. I explained the basic concepts, such as the difference between a concentration camp and an extermination camp."

The screening of the film in the high school was widely covered by the large newspapers. "There was a paralyzing silence there,' recalls Lanzmann. "They were shocked and asked intelligent questions."

"I waited to hear the questions that one often hears today in the public discourse, such as, 'But now the victims have become the bullies,' 'You are doing the same thing,' [and] 'You are the new Nazis' – but it didn't happen. After viewing Shoah, they don't dare ask questions like that. The film represses questions of that type."

Lanzmann plans to continue his round of screenings in France in schools this fall, and especially to reach the most difficult areas, such as St. Dennis.

"I think that it is vital to educate against anti-Semitism," he says. "Personally, I do not feel that my life is in danger in France. I was born here and have lived here all my life. But the problem runs deeper. Today, unlike the past, people have received a renewed legitimacy for anti-Semitism: One can and may be an anti-Semite."

Lanzmann noted that Jean Paul Sartre once said, "Anti-Semitism is not an opinion; it is a crime" – and was right. "Today, however, anti-Semitism is an opinion. Just as there are people who don't like meat or a certain fabric, there are people that don't like Jews."

Having devoted his life to the war on anti-Semitism, he says he is very sad about the new wave.

"Fifteen years ago, when Jewish graves were desecrated, millions of people went out into the streets with President Francois Mitterrand at their head. Today, people are immunized against anti-Semitic acts, which have become a matter of routine. The latest story, of the young woman that fabricated the story of the anti-Semitic attack on her, did not help matters, nor did Sharon's declarations."

After so many years, Lanzmann is not tired of the struggle against anti-Semitism.

"I think that it is something that needs to be done, and therefore, no I am not tired," he says. "As far as I am concerned, there is something very vital in Shoah."

Israel's economy: back on track

By HARRY LANGMAN
Special to The CJN

Last year total foreign investment in Israeli companies was 61 per cent higher than in 2002 and the Tel Aviv Stock Exehange rose 50 per cent. After four years of negative economic news, the smart money is investing in Israel.

As an export-oriented country, Israel's economic well being is closely tied to that of the United States and other Western nations. So when the technology bubble burst near the end of 2000 and economies around the world began to slow down, Israel's economy also faltered.

With technology accounting for almost half of Israel's exports, the lower global demand for technology translated into lower exports and fewer investments in Israeli companies. The intifadah compounded these problems, with the tourism, construction and agricultural industries particularly hard-hit.

Before the technology crash, 2000 was a record year for Israel with 7.5 per cent GDP growth and a 24 per cent increase in exports of goods and services. One year later, economic growth had sputtered to -0.9 per cent and exports had declined by 11.5 per cent. Unemployment, which stood at 8.8 per cent in 2000, increased to 10.3 per cent in 2002.

The government implemented a series of economic reforms

In response, the government implemented a series of economic reforms. Initiated in 2002, they gained momentum in 2003 when income, sales and corporate taxes were reduced to stimulate spending.

To spur competitiveness, Israel accelerated its effort to privatize state-owned entities, selling shares in companies like El Al Israel Airlines, Bank Leumi and Zim Israel Navigation Company. The Israeli government also embarked on a series of budget cuts to rein in spending, and lowered dividend and corporate taxes on major investments to attract foreign investors.

With these changes in effect, Israel's economy was prepared to recover when the American market began to pick up in mid-2003. Boosted by renewed global demand, exports of goods and services increased 6 per cent in 2003 — as compared with a 3 per cent decline the year before. Israel's economy grew slightly, by 1.3 per cent, the first year of positive growth since 2000. The improved geopolitical situation — a drop in the number of terrorist attacks in Israel and the capture of Saddam Hussein — also contributed to a cautious economic optimism.

By late 2003, foreign investors began to return to Israel. International investment in Israeli securities jumped 638 per cent last year, as foreign investors poured $354 million into the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange, up from $48 million in 2002.

Direct investment (acquisitions of Israeli companies and expansion of factories and other facilities) also increased, to $3.7 billion in 2003 from $1.6 billion in 2002 — a 128 per cent rise.

Despite the upturn in Israel's economy, some of the country's poor have had to resort to foraging for food in the garbage dumps of large cities to feed their families.

On the road to recovery

The Eastman Kodak Company, for example, acquired two Israeli companies in 2003: Algotec Systems Ltd., a digital medical imaging company, and Scitex Digital Printing.

In early 2004, Fidelity invested approximately $10 million in the Internet telephony company AudioCodes and became the largest shareholder in Radware, increasing its holdings to 13 per cent of the company from 2.6 per cent. Similarly, Israel's start-up market is beginning to see renewed activity. Intel, for example, acquired Mobilian Corporation, a fledgling wireless chip manufacturer.

Domestic venture capital activity is also on the rise. In the first quarter of the year, Israeli venture capital funds raised $563 million from foreign institutional investors, more than three times the amount raised in all of 2003. The extent of this renewed optimism was most recently illustrated by the success of Markstone Capital, Israel's largest private equity fund, which raised $500 million from investors this year.

Now, halfway through 2004, Israel continues on the road to recovery. GDP in the first six months of the year grew at an annual rate of 4.1 per cent and exports increased nearly 15 per cent. Rising consumer demand indicates greater confidence in the economy, and an increase in imports of raw materials suggests a renewed vigor in industrial production. Taking these factors into account, the Bank of Israel is predicting that the economy will grow 3.4 per cent by the end of the year, in line with other advanced economies.

Israel has weathered one of the worst economic storms in its history. Although challenges such as high unemployment remain, the outlook is vastly improved. With the economy back on track, investors are eyeing Israel once again.

In old Cossack capital, anti-Semitism rises along with unsympathetic mayor

By SUE FISHKOFF

Olga Kornyenko, secretary of the Jewish community of Novocherkassk, Russia, runs her finger along the outlines of a red swastika-like symbol painted on a telephone pole next to the city's Russian Orthodox cathedral.

It is the logo of a Russian fascist group. "It's clear this was done with official permission, so close to the main cathedral," she says. "There are skinheads all over the city. We see swastikas, graffiti saying 'Jews out,' most of it since March of this year."

Does Kornyenko take it seriously?

"Of course. Three years ago, there was no such graffiti. This is all new," she says.

A February 2001 study put the number of skinheads in Rostov at just under 1,000; they are believed to be behind the recent graffiti in Novocherkassk, Kornyenko says, but local Jews are more concerned that the authorities don't have the offending wall daubings removed.

Jews were followed home after High Holy Day services by crowds yelling "Jew" at them

Novocherkassk, a city of 200,000 people about 30 miles southwest of Rostov-on-Don, was founded in 1805 as the capital of the Don Cossacks. It is in a region of Russia considered the power base of the fascist Russian National Unity party and its youthful skinhead followers.

"What can we do?" asks Lena Malyetskaya, director of Novocherkassk's Hesed welfare organization. She notes that there are just 230 Jews in the city, most of them elderly Hesed clients. "We have very difficult relations with the city administration."

Novocherkassk's first post-Soviet mayor was very friendly toward the Jews. In fact, says Jewish community chair Anatoly Iasenik, it was the mayor's suggestion in 1996 to organize a formal Jewish community. "He wanted us to vote for Yeltsin," Iasenik explains.

For the first three years, Jewish community leadership focused on that issue, Iasenik says. "We told Jews not to vote for the communist party."

Soon, they organized a local program affiliated with Hesed, with funding and advice from Rostov's then newly created Hesed. In 1999, Iasenik registered the Jewish community as a state-recognized religious organization, affiliated with the Chabad-sponsored Federation of Jewish Communities.

Chabad's Moscow office sends them books and equipment, and pays their bills. A huge portrait of the Lubavitcher rebbe hangs on the wall.

Most of Novocherkassk's younger Jews have left for Israel or Germany

Everything changed for Novocherkassk's Jews with the election of a new mayor in 2000, one that local Jewish leaders say is not friendly to the Jewish community.

One of his first actions was to shut down Iasenik's newspaper which had supported the opposition candidate. The newspaper office, which the previous mayor had given the community for free, and which also housed the Hesed and religious community, was locked up.

In April 2001, Iasenik's home was bombed. Local Jews insist it was because he'd criticized the new mayor in print. The crime was never investigated, and Iasenik has since given up journalism.

Official indifference to anti-Semitism continues, Iasenik says. He describes how he found signs posted around town reading "Buy a gun and kill a Jew." He collected some and took them to meetings with the mayor, police chief and head of the Internal Security Service. "They wrote letters saying they couldn't find the perpetrators," he comments drily.

For six months last year, the Hesed was homeless. "I would go from place to place for meetings, carrying a huge suitcase filled with all our documents," Malyetskaya says. "It was very difficult to store the food packages."

Today, Hesed and the Jewish community share cramped offices in a pre-fab building in a dusty factory courtyard. There is no phone line, no Internet connection, and no sign at the street-level entryway to indicate that these are Jewish organizations. Community fears run high.

"My grandmother says I should never tell anyone where I work," says Malyetskaya.

When the new office opened in March of this year, some local Jews were upset that their photos appeared in a related newspaper article. "They were very frightened," Malyetskaya says.

"There are other Jews we want to help in town, but they'll never visit the Hesed office. They are afraid of their neighbors."

The past two years, she says, Jews were followed home after High Holy Day services by crowds yelling "Jew" at them.

Most of Novocherkassk's younger Jews have left for Israel or Germany, and a few have gone to the United States. Iasenik says about 20 Jewish children remain in the community. Two bar mitzvahs were celebrated this past March, and the first bat mitzvah will take place this fall.

Iasenik puts on a brave face for visitors, dreaming out loud of the day when Novocherkassk will have its own synagogue. That seems an entirely fanciful vision. Not only is the community getting smaller every year, very few of its members are halachically Jewish. The previous educational director, for example, recently immigrated to Israel after converting to Judaism.

The few wealthier Jews in town don't want to affiliate, or donate, to the Jewish community. "Nobody wants to make trouble with the mayor," Malyetskaya notes. "It could hurt their business."

Once seen as violent pogromists, Cossacks are revived

By SUE FISHKOFF

Nikolai Kozitsyn, chief of the Great Host of Don Cossacks, comes rushing into his second-story office in downtown Novocherkassk, Russia, apologizing for the informality of his navy blue sweat pants and flip-flops.

"I've been taking care of my horses," he explains.

Of course. What else would a Cossack leader be doing on a Thursday afternoon?

Kozitsyn's military greatcoat, festooned with rows of medals from the various campaigns he's taken part in, hangs to the right of his desk. He's a major general, a knight of the Order of Malta, a veteran of a clandestine Russian mission in Chechnya.

On the wall behind him hang ceremonial swords and pistols – gifts from other Cossack leaders – a Cossack banner, a portrait of 19th-century Cossack hero Matvei Platov and photos of himself with various world leaders. On his desk sit a Russian flag and a gilt-framed icon of Mary.

'Everyone in Russia wants to be a Cossack'

Since his 1991 election as ataman, or leader, of the Don Cossacks, the largest of Russia's 12 recognized Cossack groups, Kozitsyn has been interviewed by many foreign and domestic media outlets, and has become a well-known proponent of Cossack nationalism and restored militarism.

NBC covered a stunt he pulled in 1997, when he marched dozens of uniformed Cossacks into a Moscow press conference and shouted at then President Boris Yeltsin, "We are ready to serve Russia!"

Cossacks are an ethnic nationality, like Armenians, Georgians, and – in the former Soviet Union – Jews. One is born a Cossack, but one can also marry into the group. It's relatively easy to claim Cossack identity; one need only dig up a Cossack ancestor.

And although a minority of the Don Region's population is technically Cossack, Kozitsyn says, affection for the swashbuckling, leather-booted, horse-riding warrior caste is on the rise nationwide.

"Everyone in Russia wants to be a Cossack," he declares. "It's become fashionable."

"Nikolai Ivanovich is a great friend of the Jews," says Anatoly Iasenik, chair of the Jewish community of Novocherkassk, who has arranged this meeting with a hasty cell phone call. He uses Kozitsyn's patronymic.

It's a surreal scene: a Jewish reporter being introduced to the head of the Don Cossacks by the chair of the local Jewish community. My grandmother, a survivor of the Kiev pogroms, would have plotzed.

Cossacks are first mentioned in the 15th century as freedom-loving ex-serfs, Tartars and descendants of Scythian warriors living on the open plains of southern Ukraine and Russia's Don River basin.

The Don Cossacks had their own independent republic for most of the 17th century, and in 1835 reached an agreement with the Russian czar, according to which they would provide him with highly trained soldiers in return for land and special privileges.

By the beginning of the 20th century, half the Don Basin

With the fall of the USSR, Cossacks were revived population was Cossack. Considered mercenaries for the czarist order, Cossacks fought the Bolsheviks in Russia's Civil War, and were officially suppressed in 1919 by the new Soviet state. Those who could, fled abroad; many of those who remained behind were killed, their property confiscated by Soviets.

It was only with the fall of the USSR in 1991 that Cossacks were officially "revived," permitted to reopen their schools, wear their uniforms and practice their traditions of horsemanship, sword fighting and church-going.

An extensive exhibition on Cossack life is mounted in Rostov's city museum. Along with documentation of what's described as the Soviet genocide against the Cossacks are several displays suggesting good relations with local Jews. Indeed, Kozitsyn says the Don Cossacks "understand" Russian Jews, because both groups suffered the same oppression under Soviet rule.

Cossacks patrol the streets of Rostov

He neglects to mention the historic animosity between Cossack and Jew in the Russian Pale of Settlement, nor does he bring up the Cossacks who welcomed the Nazi invaders in 1941 as "liberators" from their communist overlords.

The museum's senior curator, Margarita Sokolova, says foreign Jews mistakenly lump all Cossacks together, when in fact it was the Ukrainian Cossacks, not those along the Don River, that persecuted Jews.

"No more than 100 Don Cossacks took part in the 1905 pogroms," she insists. "They were ordered to by their officers."

Jews and Don Cossacks had historically fine relations, Sokolova adds.

She is herself the product of such relations: her father is Cossack and her mother is Jewish. "Many Cossack mothers preferred that their children marry Jews" rather than ethnic Ukrainians, she notes.

Sokolova is putting a more pleasant spin on Cossack-Jewish relations than that chronicled by the local and national media. FSU Monitor, for example, documents dozens of instances of Cossack violence against Jews and other immigrants, who have poured across Russia's southern borders to escape ethnic violence in Chechnya, Georgia and Dagestan since 1992.

That reaction is generally understood as basic xenophobia, or an anti-Muslim sentiment that is at least as strong as the group's anti-Semitism.

Cossack patrols man the streets of Rostov, Azov, Stavropol and other South Russian cities, recreating their historic role as protectors of the regime.

Kozitsyn wants to strengthen Cossack culture and get his message out to the world. Six Cossack cadet schools have opened in the Don region, teaching several hundred young Cossack boys about their military heritage, and Cossack cultural festivals mark the yearly calendar.

As far as relations with the Jews are concerned, he says, "These questions have to be discussed between our communities, together. National questions should depend on people, not governments."

Noting that he "had a lot of Jewish teachers" growing up, the Don Cossack ataman nods sagely and intones, "There are no bad people, only bad leaders."

Tied in holy knots

By ESTHER HECHT
Special to The CJN

Some people will go to any lengths for a length of red string.

Red string. A whole ball of it. That was what a dear relative in the United States asked me to bring her from Israel when I come to visit her next month.

But not just any red string. It has to be the kind that vendors hawk at the Western Wall. That is, it has to be the stuff from which you make a bendel – a wristlet of red string that wards off evil, restores health and makes barren women fertile. It has to be the stuff that Madonna has turned into a fashion item and that Target stores sell for $26 apiece.

My first reaction is incredulity. "It's just string!" I bellow at my laptop.

But not just any red string

"Just red string."

Then I counsel myself, "Have respect for someone else's talisman. You may not admit it, but you also have secret ways of cajoling the hostile forces around you."

So I undertake the quest. My 90-year-old mother-in-law, who was born in Jerusalem, tells me that when she was a child no one had heard of red string. It was red ribbon then, and a bit was tied around her wrist after she recuperated from typhus.

So where to find an expert on red string? I can think of just one person who might know: a highly educated, American-born techie who is also religiously observant. She admits to ignorance, but finds a friend who knows.

The thread, I am told, can be "VOG or DMC pearl 8 cotton," the kind used for crocheting yarmulkes. It's available in many shops. Easy enough, I think.

Then comes the whammy: The sanctity of the string (and hence its effectiveness) derives from its having been wrapped seven times around Rachel's Tomb. Rachel is one of the four biblical Matriarchs, and religious women seek her intercession for everything from a good husband to a cure for cancer.

Okay, I can manage the wrapping, at least according to my vague memory from a single visit to the place in 1969. But getting there, I know, is something else.

Though Rachel's Tomb is on the road to Bethlehem just outside Jerusalem, where I live, it is in the occupied territories, neighbouring the Aida refugee camp. The building, once familiar from countless 19th-and 20th-century etchings and paintings as a graceful rectangular structure with a dome on one side, is now a fortress shrouded in a concrete casing. No one enters or leaves without the permission of security personnel. The only way to get there is by armoured bus. But I've promised. I have to get to Rachel's Tomb.

Egged, the national bus company, publishes its timetables and bus routes on the Internet, so I easily find the stop most convenient for me and the time the No. 163 arrives there. A colleague and friend, Ben, who is coming with me says the 1:10 bus suits him fine. I dress in what I think is an appropriate outfit: an ankle-length skirt, a shirt with long sleeves and a scarf to cover my hair. I even bring along a yarmulke for Ben. Then we wait, and wait, and wait. The sun is fierce. No. 160 passes, as does No. 161, both of them heading to settlements in the territories, but No. 163 never arrives.

Women praying in the outer room at Rachel's Tomb

'The bus has driven into a concrete womb'

After 40 minutes we decide to hail a taxi. The driver is encouraging. "I go everywhere in the territories," he boasts. "I've gone to more places there than anyone else."

It's a good story, but when we get to the roadblock just past the southern edge of Jerusalem, about a mile short of Rachel's Tomb, soldiers turn the taxi back. Just before the roadblock, we spy an armoured Egged bus. There is no choice now but to get on and wait for it to go.

"When do you leave?" I ask the driver.

"When the bus is full," he replies.

I look around; there are only two other passengers: a modestly dressed teenage girl and a bearded young man in a black suit and hat.

"What happened to the No. 163?" I ask.

"The schedules are off because today is Erev Rosh Chodesh [the eve of the new Jewish month]," the driver replies. "And this is a special eve."

"It's the eve of Elul," pipes up the black-suited passenger. Elul is the month of penitence that precedes the Jewish New Year. It's a time when many religious Jews visit holy places to plead for good health and prosperity in the coming year. "I just got here from the Machpela Cave," the burial site in Hebron of Abraham and Sarah, he announces with a grin. Tomb-hopping seems to be a turn-on.

We wait and wait; one by one, a few passengers come on board. Suddenly, at 2:23 a crowd materializes on the sidewalk and surges toward the bus. Men and women stumble on, pushing toward the back. The seat next to me is empty and Ben, who has been sitting across the aisle, is about to move so as to sit next to me when a young women slides into the seat. Religious men and women are not supposed to sit next to each other, so she's lucky to have found a spot next to a woman. From the back of the bus comes the call, "There's another seat here for a man." Men and women of all ages are jammed in the aisle.

When it seems there's no oxygen left, the bus sets out on the five-minute run to Rachel's Tomb. We pass the Lama Bros. shop and the Jewelry Centre, both of them victims of the intifadah. Tourists once filled the shops on the road to Bethlehem. Now the jewelry and souvenir shops are shuttered and desolate. As we pull up to the tomb, we pass a closed restaurant whose sign once announced "Quick Lunch." Now, even the sign has lost its vitality and all that's left is "Quick Lunci."

Suddenly the scenery ends; the bus has driven into a concrete womb. Here the passengers pour out and are hurried into the building by nervous security people. Anyone outside makes an easy target for snipers.

Just inside there is a water cooler; a small plaque announces that it is a donation. At a fountain nearby, people wash their hands in the ritual manner – pouring water from a large cup three times on each hand and reciting a blessing.

Signs direct us to the men's section and the women's section. Nothing looks familiar until I enter the domed room, half of which is the women's section.

And there it is: a structure about eight-feet tall and eight-feet wide; covered by a navy blue velvet cloth embroidered with symbols of the Twelve Tribes of Israel. An embroidered inscription implores the Lord to bless "the woman who comes to Your house as [You blessed the biblical Matriarchs] Rachel and Leah." A clear plastic cover protects the embroidery. I do a quick count. Ahead of me, as I get as close as I can, at least 30 women are jammed together in rows of six. The women in the first row lean against the tomb, their hands and faces pressed against the plastic. They mouth their prayers inaudibly; the only sound is of their weeping. Teenagers and gnarled grannies, all are crying as they beseech Rachel to intercede for them. It's hard to ignore the intensity of their prayers. It doesn't seem to matter that it's only a tradition that marks this spot as Rachel's Tomb.

Behind the tightly packed standing women there are a few rows of chairs. I stand in the aisle between the chairs wondering how I can accomplish my mission. It's already clear that there is no way to circumnavigate the tomb, even if it weren't the eve of the month of Elul. Though a photo taken after 1967 at the tomb clearly shows men and women together at the tomb, today partitions separate the men's section and the women's, on either side of the tomb. If no one were here, I think, my colleague Ben, a stringer for The Scotsman, could stand on the men's side and I on the women's side and toss the roll of string back and forth and so wind it around the tomb. But now I reduce my ambition to touching the string to the sacred spot.

Tomb tourists arrive from around the country

A short, heavyset woman pushes in front of me. She seems to have iron-spike elbows, because in a trice she is at the tomb. I can't figure out how she does it; no number of "Excuse me's" can get me past even the row of standing women nearest me. Now there is just one option: I motion to Iron Elbows to take the string and do the deed for me.

With the now-sacred string back in my hand, I leave the women's section. Ben is waiting for me and together we head for the bus. Everything now is anticlimax. But there is still another act to this play.

Tomb tourists have arrived on chartered buses from around the country. The policeman at the door won't let a group leave until its bus has squeezed into the concrete womb, and we can't leave until the chartered buses make way for the Egged bus.

A mustached, pot-bellied man calls out for the passengers on the bus from the northern town of Afula. The hall where we are waiting empties almost completely. Ten minutes later Pot Belly returns and bellows, "Malka, where are you?" A moment later Malka hollers back that she thought they had more time, and finally she and another women leave.

Just then about 15 soldiers, with helmets and rifles, push their way in. When I look down the hall again, they are standing in a circle and singing in harmony, "Rachel is weeping for her sons," a passage from Jeremiah.

They are still singing when I ask the policeman at the door, "Is it our turn to leave now?"

"Where were you?" he hollers. "Two Egged buses just left."

But then, miraculously, someone says the Egged bus is still there, and Ben and I rush out to catch it. As we get on the bus I ask a middle-aged woman in a blond wig whether it's always this crowded on the eve of Elul. "You're just lucky you didn't come on the 11th of Cheshvan, the date of Rachel's death," the woman answers. "Then the tomb is really mobbed."

Yes, I'm lucky. And I have the red string.

Israelis wax nostalgic to fight grim mood

By DINA KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TEL AVIV — Dancing on long wooden tables, belting out the lyrics to songs written long before they were born, young Israelis pack into a darkened Tel Aviv club where celebrating the past has become trendy.

As Israelis head into the Jewish New Year – which also marks the outbreak of the second intifadah four years ago – a sense of nostalgia permeates the national mood. Young and old both yearn for the days when Israel seemed a quieter, more innocent, more united place.

"People are looking back, musing on the days when we seemed to be strong and there were not wars and suicide bombings like this," said Danny Sides, a radio talk-show host and music editor.

"People are looking at the past and saying how nice it was, how we were strong, we were heroes, optimistic and innocent."

At Stage, a seaside club in Tel Aviv with orange walls and swirling lights, Monday nights are dedicated to what Israelis call "shirah b'tsibur," or sing-alongs, led by Sarale Sharon, a longtime icon of the genre in Israel.

Sharon gets the crowd, 300 or so 20- and 30-somethings, going with a rousing opening number, I was Born for Peace. Most of the songs sung this evening are folk tunes written between the 1950s and 1970s.

Everyone in the club is on their feet, clapping, cheering, dancing and singing along word for word. Red and orange spotlights shine on smiling faces and rows of people sway arm-in-arm to the music.

With her cropped auburn hair and loose white cotton shirt, the middle-aged Sharon, from Kibbutz Ashdod Yaakov, seems an unlikely figure to have achieved near rock-star cult status among Israel's younger set.

Yet she's been known to draw crowds in the thousands.

"It's about feeling a connection, about feeling at home," Sharon said.

Assaf Tal, 32, is celebrating his birthday the night of Sharon's show. A regular here – he comes almost every week – Tal has brought along 27 friends.

"It's a trend people like. People want Israeli things and this is our music, developed here. It's the most Israeli thing there is," he said, before being swept into a tide of friends and song.

Shirly Maimon, a 22-year-old who works as a hostess at the club, says she also is a fan of the old-time music.

"It's connected to the past. The past is very 'in' right now," she said.

As she speaks of the past, Labor Party leader Shimon Peres, a political figure who has remained on the scene throughout Israel's short history, enters the club and the young crowd suddenly notices him, rising to its feet in a standing ovation.

Some swarm around Peres, jostling for a closer look and a chance to shake his hand.

Other Knesset members, actors and songwriters are among the audience, and among those who take to the stage to try their hands at leading everyone in song.

One of them is Maya Mofaz, daughter of Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz, her magenta-sequined tank top glistening under the lights as she belts out cheery, patriotic songs in a clear, strong voice.

The grim mood and feeling of helplessness engendered by ongoing violence with the Palestinians, the economic downturn and a feeling of isolation from the international community seems to have driven Israelis to look inward.

CANADIAN SOCIETY RESPONDS

Leaders from all levels of government spoke out against anti-Semitism and hatred at a public rally in Toronto in the wake of a spate of anti-Semitic incidents that struck communities in Ontario last year.

'I think nostalgia speaks to everyone'

The second most popular radio station after the main state news channel is Reshet Gimmel, which is dedicated exclusively to Hebrew music.

Other popular new additions to the cultural scene can be found on cable TV, where one channel plays only Israeli music videos and another is dedicated exclusively to airing Israeli movies.

Israel Television airs a popular show called In the Jewish State that each week takes a long, fawning look at the history of Israeli comedy. There are stores specializing in Israeli products from the 1950s and 1960s and websites dedicated to the period.

Advertisers also are tapping into the nostalgia phenomenon, with some brands setting their TV ads in the 1950s, trying to sell products as familiar items people knew when they were young.

David Tartakover, a celebrated Israeli graphic artist and designer, co-authored the best-selling book, Where We Were and What We Did, highlighting Israeli products and games from the 1950s and 1960s. He thinks nostalgia has a special place for Israelis.

"I think nostalgia speaks to everyone," he said. "It works on connection of people to a place."

That "place," he said, is a lost Golden Age that Israelis reminisce about now that the Jewish state has been bogged down for 37 years in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

"I think the political and social situation in Israel leads to missing the period when Israel was a small country, not a conqueror, that lived within borders that were defined," Tartakover said. "We suffer from the occupation, so we miss days that came before, days of values and ideals that are different from today's."

Dan Chamizer – known throughout Israel for the baffling riddles he writes, many of which are based on Israeli cultural history and humor – said Israeli culture feels as if it's in flux because it never had time to properly digest new waves of mass immigration.

"The nostalgia is for the days [when] we once felt we shared something. Today everyone is in their own corner, living their lives. We have one destiny, but not one culture," he said. "So people are escaping to things like folkdancing and sing-alongs."

Meiron Egger, 27, a musician who runs a business leading sing-along evenings, said the music speaks to his generation.

"The situation in Israel prompts a feeling that there is a need to return to a period that was good. And these old songs of the '50s, '60s and '70s, for the younger generation they express what was good."

Brisket is back in favour

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

There are two things that are fundamental for the perfect brisket – the right recipe and your family sitting around the holiday table asking for seconds. And brisket is back in favour these days as a result of the ruck to cut carbs.

Brisket is taken from the breast section under the first five ribs and divided into two sections, the first cut and second cut. The first or flat cut has minimal fat and is usually more expensive than the more flavourful second or point cut, which has more fat. No matter which cut you choose, the brisket requires a long, slow moist cooking, must be cut across the grain and is equally delicious whether the accompanying sauce is sweet or savoury.

I recommend making the brisket a day or two ahead of time, slicing it, and then reheating it just before serving. The taste is just the same as if you'd just made it and not having any mess to clean up is an added bonus.

SAVOURY BRISKET

2 tbsp. soy sauce
½ cup coffee
3 lbs. brisket
½ cup catsup
½ cup chili sauce
½ cup honey
½ cup beef broth
2 tsp. minced garlic

Preheat oven to 325. In a large Dutch oven, brown meat on all sides. In a bowl combine the soy sauce, coffee, catsup, chili sauce, honey, beef broth and garlic. Mix to combine and then pour the mixture over the brisket. Cover and simmer on stove top or in the oven for 3-4 hours or until tender. Allow to cool slightly and cut across the grain. This recipe can be made ahead of time, sliced, refrigerated or frozen and then reheated just before serving. Serves 6. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

APPLE BUTTER BRISKET

5 lbs. beef brisket
1 onion, quartered
10 whole cloves
1 tsp. mince garlic
2 onions sliced into rings
1 cup apple butter
½ cup dry white wine
3 tbsp. prepared mustard
2 tbsp. green onion, minced
1½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. curry powder
½ tsp. pepper

Preheat oven to 325. Place the brisket, onion, cloves and garlic in a large Dutch oven and add water to cover. Bring to a boil, cover, reduce heat and simmer 2½ hours. Place the sliced onion on the bottom of a roasting pan. Remove brisket from Dutch oven and then place brisket on top of the onions in a roasting pan. In a saucepan combine apple butter, wine, mustard, green onions, salt, curry powder and pepper. Cook over medium heat 3 to 4 minutes, stirring occasionally. Remove the mixture from the heat and then brush ½ cup apple butter mixture over the top of the brisket. Bake, uncovered, at 325 for 30 minutes, basting occasionally with remaining apple butter mixture. Makes 8-10 servings

PEPPERED BRISKET

Marinating this brisket overnight really enhances the flavour.

4-5 lbs. boneless beef brisket
¼ cup coarsely ground black pepper
⅔ cup soy sauce
½ cup vinegar
1 tbsp. catsup
1 tsp. paprika
1-2 tsp. minced garlic

Trim most of the fat from the brisket. Spread the pepper on waxed paper and then place the brisket on top of the pepper. Turn the brisket to coat all sides with the pepper. In a bowl combine the soy sauce, vinegar, catsup, paprika and garlic. Mix well. Place brisket in a shallow dish and pour marinade over it. Cover and refrigerate overnight, turning meat occasionally. When ready to cook, line a large pan with foil. Place the brisket in the pan and pour marinade over meat. Cover with another large piece of foil and securely fold it into the bottom foil to seal. Bake at 300 to 325 for 3-4 hours, or until tender. Serves 8. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

CROCKPOT BRISKET WITH CRANBERRY GRAVY

3-4 lbs beef brisket
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
1 (16 oz.) can whole berry cranberry sauce*
1 (8 oz.) can tomato sauce
1 onion, chopped
1 tbsp. mustard

Trim excess fat from beef. Rub surface of beef with salt and pepper. Place beef in 3½ quart or larger slow cooker (crockpot). In a bowl combine the cranberry sauce, tomato sauce, onion and mustard. Mix to combine and then pour the sauce over the brisket. Cover and cook on low 10-12 hours or until beef is tender. Cool slightly and then cut across grain into thin slices. Skim the excess fat from the cranberry sauce and serve it with the brisket. Serves 8. This recipe can be made in a conventional oven. This recipe can also be doubled.

*Whole berry sauce is recommended for its appearance, but you can use jellied if you like. (I pour the juices/sauce into a container and cool in refrigerator until fat rises to the top and then using a slotted spoon, I remove the fat and then reheat juices/sauce).

BRISKET WITH PORTOBELLO MUSHROOMS AND DRIED CRANBERRIES

1 cup dry red wine
1 cup canned beef broth or chicken broth
½ cup frozen cranberry juice concentrate, thawed
¼ cup flour
1 large onion, peeled and sliced
4 garlic cloves, chopped
1½ tbsp. chopped fresh rosemary
4-5 lbs trimmed brisket
salt and pepper to taste
12 medium Portobello mushrooms, sliced
1 cup dried cranberries

Preheat oven to 300. In a bowl combine the wine, broth, cranberry juice concentrate and flour and whisk them together. Pour the mixture into a large roasting pan. Add the onion, garlic and rosemary to the mixture. Sprinkle the top of the brisket with salt and pepper. Place the brisket, fat side up, in roasting pan. Spoon some of wine mixture over top. Cover pan tightly with heavy aluminum foil (but foil shouldn't touch meat). Bake until very tender, basting with pan juices every hour, for about 3½-4 hours. Transfer the brisket to a plate and let it cool about 1 hour at room temperature. Thinly slice brisket against grain. Arrange slices in pan with sauce overlapping slices slightly. At this point, the brisket can be covered and refrigerated, if desired, up to 2 days ahead.

To serve, preheat oven to 350. Place the mushrooms and cranberries in the sauce around brisket; cover with foil. Bake until mushrooms are tender and brisket is heated through, about 40 minutes if brisket has been refrigerated, about 25-30 minutes if room temperature. Transfer sliced brisket to platter and cover with sauce. Serves 8

GARLIC BRISKET

This variation of the classic chicken with 40 cloves of garlic was given to me by my neighbour who says she cut it out of a magazine 5 years ago and hasn't made any other recipe since.

30-35 garlic cloves, plus 1 tsp. minced garlic pan of boiling water
3 tbsp. olive oil
first-cut beef brisket (about 5 lbs.), trimmed of excess fat, wiped with a damp paper towel and patted dry
2 tbsp. red wine vinegar
3 cups beef or chicken broth or low-sodium canned broth
3-4 fresh thyme sprigs or 2 teaspoons dried thyme
2 fresh rosemary sprigs, plus 1 teaspoon chopped rosemary salt and freshly ground black pepper
1 tsp. grated lemon zest

Preheat the oven to 325. Drop the garlic into the boiling water for about 30 seconds. Drain them immediately and peel the garlic as soon as it's cool enough to hold. Set the peeled garlic aside on paper towels to drain. In the bottom of a large roasting pan heat the olive oil over medium heat (one big enough to hold the meat in one layer). Add the brisket, and sear it on both sides, about 10 minutes. Transfer the brisket to a platter and set it aside. Pour off all but about 1 tbsp. of fat remaining in the pan and add the garlic cloves.

Cook over medium heat, stirring occasionally, until the garlic edges are just starting to turn light brown. Add the vinegar and

Soups perfect to break the fast or for Sukkot

Neil Gworth, owner of Neil's Soup Kettle, a line of kosher ready-to-serve soups packed in mason jars has offered some soup recipes that are perfect for breaking the fast or as part of a Sukkot meal.

AUTUMN AMBROSIA

2 cups vegetable stock
2 cups water
2 cups apple juice
3 cups pumpkin or butternut squash (canned, frozen or fresh)
3 peeled and chopped apples
1 large chopped onion
1 tsp. mild curry powder
salt to taste
1/4 tsp. ground cinnamon
1/2 cup honey
1 tbsp. cooking oil
a dollop of sour cream and chives

Sauté onion, apples and pumpkin and oil in a pot for about 2 minutes. Reduce heat, add curry powder, cinnamon, cover pot and allow mixture to sweat. When onions are translucent add water, vegetable stock, apple juice and honey. Bring to a boil and allow to simmer for about 45 minutes until pumpkin or squash is soft.

Remove from heat and purée mixture in a blender. Return the mixture to the pot and add salt to taste. Garnish with a dollop of sour cream and chives. Serves 6-8.

BANDERA BLACK BEAN SOUP

2 cups dry black beans
4 cups water
1 chopped Spanish onion
1 tsp. ground dried coriander
1 tsp. ground cumin
3 cloves crushed garlic
salt to taste
1 tbsp. olive oil
1 tsp. chilpotle peppers or pepper sauce
1/2 cup white wine
fresh cut corn
a dollop of salsa

Rinse beans, then soak them in water in a pot for at least 4-5 hours. Strain and rinse again, then return them to the pot and add 4 cups of water. Bring to a boil, simmer and allow beans to cook for about 1 1/2 hours.

Cover beans while cooking, then sauté onions, cumin, coriander and garlic with olive oil in a saucepan for about two minutes. Reduce heat, cover the pan and allow mixture to sweat. When onions appear translucent add mixture to bean pot and stir. Add wine and pepper sauce. When beans appear cooked, purée the soup in a blender. Return the soup to the pot and adjust thickness with water and add salt to taste. Garnish with fresh cut corn and a dollop of salsa. Serves 6-8.

deglaze pan, scraping up all the browned bits from the bottom with a wooden spoon. Add the broth, thyme and rosemary sprigs, and reduce the heat to a simmer. Salt and pepper the brisket to taste and place it in the pan, fat side up. Spoon the garlic cloves over the meat.

Cover the pan with a lid or heavy- duty foil and place the brisket in the oven. Cook, basting every half hour, until meat is fork tender, 2 1/2-3 hours or longer. (As the meat cooks, check to make sure that liquid is only bubbling gently. If the boil is too rapid, the temperature is too high and you need to turn it down, to about 300). Transfer the brisket to a cutting board and tent it loosely with foil. Prepare the gravy.

Strain the sauce, saving the garlic but discarding the thyme and rosemary sprigs. Skim as much of the fat as possible from the liquid. Purée about a half of the cooked garlic and 1 cup liquid in a food processor or a blender. Transfer the puréed mixture, the remaining liquid and the rest of the cooked garlic to a skillet. Add the remaining chopped rosemary and minced garlic and the lemon zest. Boil down the gravy over high heat, uncovered until slightly thickened. Season to taste. You can purée all of the cooked garlic if you prefer a really smooth gravy.

Cut the brisket into thin slices across the grain. Serve on a platter with a little of the sauce poured over the top. Pass the rest of the sauce to serve with the brisket. Serves 6-8.

APPLE GLAZED BEEF BRISKET

This beef brisket is glazed with apple jelly and brown mustard and is perfect for any yontif table.

beef brisket, about 5 lbs.
water
1 medium onion, quartered
2 cloves garlic, cut into halves
10 whole cloves
1 (10 oz.) jar apple jelly
3 tbsp. brown mustard
3 tbsp. minced green onion
salt to taste
1/4 tsp. pepper
3/4 tsp. curry powder

Place the brisket, onion, garlic and cloves in a large heavy saucepan. Add water to cover and bring the mixture to a boil. Immediately reduce the temperature to a simmer and cook for 2 1/2-3 hours or until beef is tender. Drain the meat. Preheat oven to 325. In a saucepan combine the apple jelly, mustard, green onions, salt, pepper and curry powder. Bring the mixture to a boil. Place the drained beef in large roasting or baking dish. Brush the top of the brisket with glaze. Bake for 45 minutes, basting often. Remove the brisket from the oven and let cool enough to slice. Cut across the grain. Serve immediately. Serves 8-10.

Holiday recipes from the Kashruth Council of Canada

The Kashruth Council of Canada has provided the community with the following holiday recipes:

LENTIL SOUP (PAREVE)

The pottage for which Esau sold his birthright (recorded in Genesis) was made from red lentils, but brown lentils are also suitable for this soup.

2 cups red or brown lentils, picked over and rinsed (set aside)
2 tbsp. olive or canola oil
1 large onion, diced
2 cloves garlic, crushed
1 large carrot, sliced
1 rib celery, sliced
5 cups cold water or pareve stock
1 large can stewed tomatoes
1 tbsp. dried dill weed
2 dried bay leaves
1 tsp. dried oregano
salt to taste
freshly ground pepper, to taste

In a large saucepan, heat oil over medium heat. Add onion, garlic, carrot and celery; sauté for 5 minutes. Add water or stock, lentils and remaining ingredients. Bring to a boil. Reduce heat, cover and simmer for 45-50 minutes, or until lentils are tender, stirring occasionally. Discard bay leaves. Serves 8-10.

Note: If soup is too thick, add water until desired consistency. Freezes well.

Variation: For dairy, garnish with grated Parmesan or Mozzarella cheese.

MARINATED VEAL ROAST OR RIB EYE OF BEEF

4-5-lb. shoulder veal, or rib eye of beef rolled and tied

Marinade:
½ cup soya sauce
½ cup kosher dry wine
2 cloves garlic, crushed
1 tbsp. dry mustard
1 tsp. ginger (optional)
½ tsp. dried thyme

Combine marinade ingredients, mixing well. Place veal or beef in a large clear plastic bag, set in a deep bowl to steady. Pour in marinade and close beg tightly. Refrigerate overnight. Occasionally turn bag and press against meat in several places to distribute marinade evenly. Remove meat from marinade. Place on rack in shallow roasting pan. Roast uncovered at 325 for 2½-3 hours or until meat thermometer registers 175, basting occasionally with marinade during the last hour. Garnish with apple rings. Serves 8-10.

Apple Rings:

This makes a lovely garnish for the roast.
1 cup sugar
¼ cup water
¼ cup vinegar
5 whole cloves
1 stick cinnamon
2 red apples
red or green vegetable colouring
¼ cup jam raisins (optional)

Cook the sugar, water, vinegar, cloves and cinnamon for 5 minutes. Wash and dry the apples, but do not peel them. Core, cut crosswise into ½-inch slices and cook slowly in the syrup until transparent. Remove the apple slices carefully. Add the vegetable colouring to the syrup and cook until thick. Pour over the apple slices. Cool and arrange as a garnish. If desired, fill the centres where the core was removed with jam or raisins.

COLOURFUL VEGETABLE SALAD

1 white radish, peeled and thinly sliced
1 English cucumber, skin on, thinly sliced
1 each red, yellow and orange pepper, seeded and cut into thin strips
2 potatoes, peeled, boiled, cooled and sliced
1 cup green or black pitted olives (optional)
2 garlic cloves, crushed
2 green onions, sliced on the bias garnish – 2 tbsp. chopped fresh flat leaf parsley (please check fresh parsley carefully for insects)

Dressing: juice of 1 lemon
1 tbsp. sugar
1 tsp. Tabasco sauce
1/4 cup extra virgin olive oil
1 tbsp. kosher white wine
1/2 tbsp. vinegar

Mix all dressing ingredients together and shake well. Arrange the radish, cucumber, pepper strips, potatoes and olives on a serving platter or in a salad bowl. Sprinkle with the garlic and onions. Pour dressing over and sprinkle with the chopped parsley. Serves 6-8.

STUFFED ZUCCHINI

4 zucchini

Blanch zucchini whole in boiling salted water for 5 minutes. Drain, cool and cut in half lengthways. Scoop out the centres, leaving a thick shell. Chop the flesh and set aside.

Stuffing:
2 tbsp. olive oil
1 onion, chopped
2 garlic cloves, finely chopped
1/2 cup raisins, soaked in warm water for 10 minutes and drained (optional)
1/2 cup pine nuts (optional)
1 cup cooked brown rice
1 tbsp. finely chopped flat leaf parsley (please check fresh parsley carefully for insects)
salt to taste
freshly ground pepper to taste
1 tsp. dried thyme
1/2 cup dry bread crumbs

Heat oil in a skillet. Add the onions and garlic and sauté until golden, about 10 minutes, stirring occasionally. Add the raisins, nuts and scooped chopped zucchini. Cook gently for 10 minutes. Raise the heat and boil to evaporate excess moisture. Stir in the rice and parsley, salt and pepper (to taste) and thyme. Mix well.

Preheat oven to 375. Arrange zucchini shells closely together in an oiled roasting pan. Fill each with the stuffing. Sprinkle with the bread crumbs. Bake 25-30 minutes until zucchini are tender and the tops golden. Serves 8.

Note: For dairy sprinkle with grated cheese.

Variation: Cut the zucchini in half widthways. Trim a small piece off bottoms and tops so they will stand. Use a melon baller or apple corer to scoop out the flesh. Follow above instructions.

Do-ahead dishes for breaking the fast

BY NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Here are some scrumptious ideas for elegant, do-ahead dishes to grace your table for breaking the fast following Yom Kippur. The recipes are easy to make, use readily available ingredients, and can be prepared in advance and frozen until needed, which makes them all winners!

When Chef Jeffrey Nathan first started serving this easy, do-ahead cheesecake, he had a hard time winning over people who were used to sweet cheesecakes. After the first bite, they became believers. It's rich, so serve very thin slices! Offer it on a platter with lavash or other flatbreads. It's a great spread – just the thing to come home to for a Yom Kippur breaking of the fast. The recipe comes from his cookbook Adventures in Jewish Cooking (Clarkson Potter Publishers).

CHEF JEFFREY NATHAN'S SMOKED SALMON CHEESECAKE

2 tbsp. unsalted butter, melted
3 tbsp. freshly grated Parmesan cheese
3 tbsp. seasoned dried bread crumbs
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
⅓ cup finely chopped onion
⅓ cup finely chopped red bell pepper
⅓ cup finely chopped green bell pepper
1 tsp. kosher salt
½ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
1½ lbs. cream cheese, at room temperature (3 250-ml packages)
4 large eggs, at room temperature
8 oz. (250 g) sliced smoked salmon or smoked salmon scraps (available at some delicatessens), chopped
2 tbsp. chopped fresh dill
½ cup (4 ounces) shredded Havarti cheese
⅓ cup heavy cream

Position a rack in the centre of the oven and preheat the oven to 350. Generously brush an 8-inch springform pan with the melted butter. Wrap the bottom of the pan in a double thickness of aluminum foil.

In a small bowl, mix the Parmesan cheese and bread crumbs. Pour into the pan, and tilt to coat the pan halfway up the sides. Pat the crumbs in the bottom of the pan into an even, thin layer.

Heat the oil in a medium skillet over medium heat. Add the onion and the red and green bell peppers. Cook, stirring occasionally, until softened, about 6 minutes. Stir in the salt and pepper. Cool completely.

Beat the cream cheese in a heavy-duty electric mixer fitted with the paddle attachment on medium-low speed until smooth, about 1 minute. Scrape down the sides of the bowl with a rubber spatula. Add the vegetables. With the mixer running, add the eggs, one at a time, just until blended, scraping the bowl as needed. Add the smoked salmon, dill, Havarti and heavy cream, and mix just until blended. Spread evenly in the springform pan. Place the pan in a large roasting pan. Slide the rack halfway out of the oven. Pour enough water in the roasting pan to come halfway up the side of the springform pan. Slide the rack back into the oven carefully.

Bake until the edges are puffed and golden but the centre still seems slightly unset, about 1½ hours. Run a knife around the edge of the cheesecake to release it from the sides of the pan. Cool completely on a wire rack.

Remove the sides of the pan. Wrap the cheesecake tightly with plastic wrap. Refrigerate until chilled, at least 4 hours or overnight. (The cheesecake can be made up to 2 days ahead.)

Cut into thin slices and serve on plates, garnishing each serving with frisee lettuce, cherry tomatoes and red onions, along with crackers for spreading. Makes 12 servings.

ROASTED VEGETABLE STRUDEL

For a delicious do-ahead main dish, be sure to try this scrumptious strudel. The recipe comes from Gatherings: Creative Kosher Cooking From our Families to Yours (Netivot Hatorah Day School, Toronto). Shawna Magence, one of the book's editors, recommended this yummy, triple-tested recipe for your enjoyment. The oven-roasted vegetables are divine on their own or taste terrific served with pasta. Enjoy.

1 lb. fresh asparagus, cleaned, left whole
2 red peppers, halved, cleaned
1 yellow pepper, halved, cleaned
2 zucchinis, cut lengthwise in thick pieces
2 large Portobello mushrooms, sliced
1 red onion, thickly sliced
4 cloves of garlic, peeled cup feta cheese, cubed cup fresh basil, chopped
salt and pepper to taste
2 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
12 to 24 phyllo sheets (6 per strudel) melted butter
sesame seeds to sprinkle on top

Preheat oven to 450. Place asparagus, peppers, zucchinis, mushrooms, red onion and garlic on a large greased baking sheet. Put in oven for 20 minutes. Remove from oven and chop. Add feta, basil, salt, pepper and vinegar.

Lay out 1 phyllo sheet. Brush with melted butter. Put another sheet on top of the first, brushing it with melted butter. Continue this process with 4 to 6 sheets of phyllo, depending on the thickness that you want the strudel to be.

Spread some roasted vegetables across the bottom of the phyllo sheets. Start rolling up sheets over vegetables, jelly-roll style. Fold over ends and continue rolling. Brush with butter on top. Sprinkle with sesame seeds.

Score with 4 diagonal cuts along top of strudel. Bake for 15 minutes. Servings: 2 to 4 strudels. Freezes well.

JERUSALEM — Palestinian security organizations in the Gaza Strip have redoubled their efforts to obtain weapons and ammunition before the Israel Defence Forces withdraw from the area and the settlements are evacuated.

Every Palestinian organization represented in Gaza is preparing for "withdrawal day," with each group considering several scenarios, including the possibility of armed clashes.

The arms and ammunition are bought from smugglers who bring them into Gaza from Egypt by tunnels under the Philadelphi Road.

Israelis fixing hearts in Third World

By SHAANAN MEYER-STEIN

STONE TOWN, Zanzibar — Inside the Mnaje Mojo hospital – "one coconut" in Swahili – it was absolute chaos.

The place was teeming with people and I had to push my way through what seemed a never-ending crowd to get to the small room at the end of the corridor.

When I opened the door to the pitch-black chamber, the only light I saw came from a computer monitor in the back. On the top right-hand corner of the screen I read the words, "Save A Child's Heart."

Two white men sat huddled together, focused intently on the screen, while a black woman, wearing a burka, sat on a bed holding an infant.

These are the moments that make me proud to be a part of the Jewish people.

The men, Uri Katz and Lior Sasson, were Israeli Jewish physicians from the Save A Child's Heart organization, through which the pair travels around the world examining children with congenital heart problems and brings them back to Israel for free surgeries and

CJN Wins Award

TORONTO — Reena, an agency that integrates people with developmental disabilities into the community, gave The CJN its Media Appreciation Award earlier this month. The prize is given annually to an individual or corporation who has portrayed people with developmental disabilities to the community in a dignifying and positive manner. It was presented Sept. 9 at Reena's annual meeting.

Former MP Dies

MORRISBURG, Ont. — Jack Marshall, a former Progressive Conservative member of Parliament and senator from Newfoundland and Labrador, died last month in Morrisburg, Ont., at age 84. Born in Glace Bay, N.S., he was first elected to the House of Commons in 1968 and re-elected in 1972 and 1974. He was appointed to the Senate by former prime minister Pierre Trudeau in 1978 and retired in 1994 at age 75. The veteran of World War II was an advocate for veterans' rights who founded and chaired the Senate sub-committee on veterans' affairs.

Fund for Beslan

TORONTO — UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has set up a fund to provide emergency trauma relief from Israeli experts to the people of Beslan, Russia, in the wake of the hostage-taking crisis there earlier this month in which 330 people were killed. To contribute, call 416-635-2833 or visit www.jewishtoronto.com.

Cotler Reiterates Pledge to Fight Hate

KELOWNA, B.C. — In a Sept. 7 address to the Okanagan Jewish Community, Justice Minister Irwin Cotler reiterated the government's commitment to fight hate and anti-Semitism.

Noting the rise in anti-Semitic incidents in Canada and around the world, Cotler, who was in Kelowna for a cabinet retreat, stressed the need to combat racism with education.

"Racism starts not simply with overt acts of violence, it starts with words," Cotler said.

Justice Minister Irwin Cotler, right, talks with Okanagan Jewish Community president Mel Kotler.

More Desecrations

AUCKLAND — More Jewish graves in New Zealand were desecrated earlier this month. Red swastikas were found on the lone Jewish headstone honouring 14 people that stands in the cemetery of the tiny town of Wanganui, and the headstone itself was smashed. As well, four headstones were toppled in the Symonds Street Cemetery in Auckland. Last month, 113 headstones were toppled in Wellington's Makara Cemetery.

Supremacist Dead

SPOKANE, Wash. — Richard Butler, founder of the Aryan Nations white supremacist group, died Sept. 8 at age 86. In the 1970s, Butler opened a compound in Coeur d'Alene, Idaho (near Spokane, Wash.) that became a centre for his racist, anti-Semitic group. Butler believed Jews were descended from Satan and controlled the media and that African Americans were inferior "mud people." In recent years, Butler's influence had waned, and he was forced to sell his compound after a court judgment against his group. His movement also spawned a tolerance movement in Coeur d'Alene, as local residents established groups opposed to racism and anti-Semitism.

New Shuls in Russia

MOSCOW — A new synagogue opened on Sept. 10 in Birobidzhan, an area designated by Josef Stalin as a Jewish homeland. The two-storey Moorish-style shul is the first to be built in the region, declared a Jewish autonomous region by Stalin in 1934, since the last wooden one burned down there in the late 1950s. The opening in Birobidzhan, now home to an estimated 2,000 to 6,000 Jews, coincided with the opening the same week of shuls in two other cities in the Russian far east. On Sept. 8, a 100-year-old shul building in Vladivostok, used for years as a chocolate factory, was returned by the government to the local Jewish community, headed by Chabad Rabbi Menachem Raskin. The next day, a new shul opened in Khabarovsk.

Old Shul Reopens

SARAJEVO — During Rosh Hashanah, Sarajevo's Old Stone Synagogue will be used for religious services for the first time since 1941. The synagogue was built in 1581 and after World War II was used as a Jewish museum, which closed in 1992 because of the Bosnian War. Jakob Finci, head of the Bosnian Jewish community, said that after the holidays, work will begin to reconstruct the museum. Sarajevo's Jewish community normally uses another synagogue, built a century ago.

School bullying: 'No easy solutions'

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Special Report

Last fall, a group of kids started teasing Gregor, 10, in the school playground. As the school year progressed, others joined in and the taunts turned nasty. By March, his entire class got involved – as participants or observers – while Gregor was ridiculed.

The principal sent the boy for counselling to help him cope. After Gregor was beaten up in the playground, his parents withdrew him from the school.

Across the street, in a different Jewish day school, Josephine, 9, sat in her seat afraid to go to the bathroom. Every time she ventured there, a group of girls demanded her money. When she refused, they flushed her hat down the toilet and warned of worse to come if she ratted.

After the parents complained, the school intervened. It is likely that in order to avoid embarrassing the families of the bullies, the school chose not to involve Josephine's family in the process. Josephine never knew why the harassment stopped, but it did. Yet, for an entire year, the little girl hesitated before going to the bathroom, anxious about the possibility that the bullying would resume.

In yet another Jewish school, Julie K. 11, wondered how she'd make it through the day. No one would sit beside her. Every time she sat next to a group of girls, they got up and walked away.

Julie, with the approval of her parents, decided to stand up to the bullies. It was a decision she would come to regret.

The names of these children have been changed, but their stories are real. As school begins, their parents pray that bullying won't be part of the family's agenda again this year.

One alleged bullying incident involving a Jewish day school and a set of parents was recently addressed by the courts. In August, Judge J. Pitt of the Ontario Superior Court of Justice wrote that "a serious dispute arose in the spring of 2004 between Leo Baeck Day School and the parents… with respect to the school's handling of allegations of bullying by other students."

Pitt further wrote that "attempts to resolve the issue… were unsuccessful."

"Each situation is different and there are no easy solutions," said Dr. Richard Goldbloom, a pediatrician who has written extensively on the subject, "but the first thing a school must do is bring the bullying problem out into the open.

"If a school says they don't have that problem, don't believe it," Goldbloom noted. "It is a fact of life. The strong will always try to take advantage of the weak in order to put themselves in a position of superiority.

"Adults do it too," said Goldbloom, who is also chancellor of Dalhousie University.

The bullied are often the vulnerable – the kids who are a bit too fat, or a tad too studious. They may be gifted, have attention deficit disorder or Tourette's syndrome. Some of them watch too much television, others don't watch enough. Something about them is different.

The bully also comes in different shapes and colours, from the most popular girls in the class to the lone classroom tough looking for someone to pick on.

A treasury of good books

From the editor's desk

Jewish history and tradition have inculcated deep within our collective framework of values and emotional psyche, a deep respect, and sometimes even reverence, for books.

"If you drop some gold and some books," our sages taught, "pick up first the books and then the gold."

Books are special. Good books are a treasure.

Thus, I must tell readers about two treasures that came across my desk recently, both published by Paul Dry Books, a small niche publishing house in Philadelphia whose declared purpose is to publish "books for people interested in close reading," as its founder, Paul Dry, recently said in an interview with Nell Porter Brown in Harvard magazine.

"We launched our first books in spring 2000," Dry told the interviewer, "starting with four out-of-print titles. We plan to publish four or five books each season – both new works and old."

In that short time, Paul Dry Books has become known as a house that dares to publish only works of engaging literary quality and challenging intellectual pursuit.

The Parnas, by Silvano Arieti, and Farewell to Salonica, by Leon Sciaky, fall squarely within those parameters.

Arieti escaped from his native Pisa, Italy, in 1939. A recently graduated medical doctor, he fled to the United States, where he became a renowned psychiatrist and psychoanalyst and an award-winning author.

Subtitled A Scene from the Holocaust, The Parnas tells the story of the last few days of the life of Giuseppe Pardo Roques, the parnas of Arieti's community, the Jews of Pisa. The term parnas was an honorific as well as functional title, meaning the leader or president of the community.

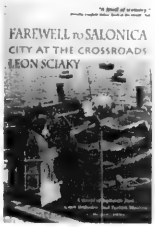
Pardo was an actual figure of history. Though based on archival material, years of research, interviews and eye-witness accounts, the story is a fictionalized retelling of the fateful last days of Pardo's life.

Arieti knew Pardo and was greatly influenced by him. Thus, the story is a tribute to a mentor whose remarkable heroism and generosity of spirit Arieti was determined to make known to a wider world. He writes as a Jew, an Italian, a historian and a psychiatrist. The book cuts to the reader's soul at all these levels.

The Parnas is written elegantly, with tender respect for its subject matter and with the eye for the seemingly small but revealing detail of a practised psychiatrist and diagnostician.

"This is a story of suffering and fear, but it is also more," Arieti writes in the introduction. "It is the account of a discovery I made by means of that suffering, one that has deeply affected my life and my work. I have been a psychiatrist for many years, and the discovery concerns the nobility and greatness that are at times hidden within mental illness. Yes, I have come to believe that mental illness may hide and express the spirituality of man. It is my wish here to acquaint readers with my discovery by introducing them to the man who was called 'the parnas.'"

The Parnas is a work of intense emotional gravity and compelling didactic beauty.



Farewell to Salonica by Leon Sciaky is an enchanting autobiographical memoir of the author's childhood at the turn of the last century in Salonica, a place where different faiths, ethnicities and cultures lived alongside each other in tolerance and mutual respect: Greeks, Turks, Macedonians, Serbs, Albanians, Bulgarians - Christians, Muslims and Jews of the Balkan, Aegean and Mediterranean basin.

But the idyl that Sciaky describes was doomed by the crash on the rocks of rising nationalisms and scheming governments.

Sciaky's book is a gently told, insightful evocation of the many exotic sights, sounds, smells and colours of life in Salonica's storied cosmopolitan community. His descriptive powers are prodigious. Like a painter brushing stroke upon stroke of colour, hue and texture onto his canvass, Sciaky methodically recreates the interiors of the houses, the pathways of the streets and the bold characters of the marketplaces.

Anyone interested in the history and the wandering of the Jewish people will be interested in this book. Salonica was once one of the most famous Jewish communities in Europe. With loving detail, Sciaky recreates it for us.

It is a delight to read.

High Holy Day services too boring, costly: survey

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Almost half the 550 respondents to the National Jewish Outreach Program's online survey about the High Holy Days said Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur services are too long, boring, repetitive or not relevant, and even more – 69 per cent – said the cost of tickets was too high, unwarranted, a turnoff or should be reconsidered.

NJOP, a New York-based organization established 17 years ago, is trying to change those statistics through its beginners' services, a list of which can be found online at www.njop.org/html/HighHolidayLocations.html.

Of the 39 North American locations, three are in Canada – Aish Winnipeg, Congregation House of Jacob/Mikveh Israel in Calgary, and Beth Israel Synagogue in Edmonton. Other beginners' services exist, but may not be affiliated.

At Aish Winnipeg, beginners' services have three components – Carlebach-style davening, a running commentary on the service, and simultaneous alternative classes, said Rabbi Shimon Lesserson, executive director of the city's Aish HaTorah affiliate.

Yannai Segal, a facilitator for beginners' services at Congregation House of Jacob/Mikveh Israel in Calgary, said the services there will be interactive and will feature discussion and a selection of prayers.

At Beth Israel synagogue in Edmonton, learners' services on Yom Kippur are designed to make "people who are not as used to traditional services a little more comfortable and let them know what's going on," said Rabbi Daniel Friedman.

"Our job [as rabbis and Jewish leaders] is to make sure people have a vehicle where they can come in and connect," said Rabbi Yitzchak Rosenbaum, NJOP's program director.

Although half the respondents – 49 per cent – found services "just right," the half that did not signals a need for change, Rabbi Rosenbaum said.

"What it says to us is that rabbis and leaders have to look for a way to tighten up services, make them a little more interesting. We try to give people what they're looking for, and all the things that are important for them in terms of Jewish knowledge and Jewish learning."

The NJOP model for beginners' services encourages rabbis to take questions. Rabbi Rosenbaum also mentioned "letting people know where they are, what they're doing and why they're doing it," as well as an increased focus on communal singing.

To his surprise, slightly more than half the survey respondents said that, for them, the most important part of High Holy Day services was prayer. Only 15 per cent chose "hearing the shofar" in the multiple-choice questionnaire.

"I would have thought there'd be more [choosing the shofar]. It's considered the highlight of the day, and according to Jewish law, in a way it's more important than the prayer aspect," said Rabbi Rosenbaum.

"The idea that the praying is so important, I think is fascinating. People are searching for a connection. They want to pray to God."

The survey was sent to NJOP's mailing list, a group of people who already had a degree of Jewish connection, at least through their contact with the outreach organization.

Fifty-eight per cent of respondents said they attend synagogue at least once a month, and 78 per cent said they usually attend High Holy Day services, with 74 per cent saying they both fast and attend synagogue on Yom Kippur.

Israeli gays marry in Toronto

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In a socially trailblazing event in Toronto on Sept. 10, Israeli gays Uzi Even and Amit Kama were married in a same-sex civil ceremony at city hall.

"The Canadian provinces of Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia are the only places in the world that offer access to civil marriage on a full and equal basis," said their friend, Doug Hauer, a Boston lawyer who was married in Toronto just over three months ago. "You guys in Canada are ahead of the game."

Even and Kama, who have lived together for 18 years, left Toronto on Sept. 18 after a nine-day honeymoon, knowing that their marriage is contentious in Israel.

"This marriage won't be recognized in Israel automatically," said Even. "We'll have to submit our papers to the Ministry of Interior."

Once they complete the required paperwork and receive their Canadian documents, in about four months, they intend to take their case to the Israeli Supreme Court.

"We're not planning to challenge the marriage law in Israel, which is under the control of the rabbinate," explained Even, who became Israel's first openly gay member of Knesset in November 2002 when the left-wing Meretz party appointed him to replace a retired MK.

"I want Israel to recognize our Canadian marriage," said Even, 63, a Tel Aviv University chemistry professor and former nuclear physicist and colonel in the Israeli army.

Individual gay rights in Israel are enshrined in law. But Israel does not recognize same-sex couples, and Even and Kama, a 44-year-old communication theorist at Tel Aviv's Open University, will fight to change that regulation.

"My partner has no legal status," Even said in an interview two days after their wedding.

Low-key and soft-spoken, Even did not seek publicity for his case. Prior to flying to Toronto, he managed to get an appointment with his friend, Interior Minister Avraham Poraz.

Will take case to Israel's Supreme Court

"I explained the situation to him before we left. I told him Israel is obliged to accept a Canadian marriage certificate. Poraz told me I had handed him a 'nuclear device' on a silver platter, and had to consult his staff. Then he told us we'd have to go to the Supreme Court."

Poraz's cautious approach deeply disappointed him because Poraz's party, Shinui, a member of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's coalition government, supports gay rights across the board.

"Poraz's attitude is a breach of promise," Even said.

The pair decided to get married after Hauer informed them they would have no problems in Toronto.

"I immediately seized the opportunity, even though we had to fly halfway around the world to do it," Even said.

Being an atheist, he did never considered following Hauer's example and submitting to a religious marriage performed by a rabbi.

"There are several Reform rabbis [in Toronto] who were prepared to marry us," he said.

Born in Haifa to eastern European immigrants who settled in Palestine before World War II, Even has been battling for gay rights since the early 1980s.

A graduate of the Reali school and the Technion, he was a colonel in the reserves, specializing in military intelligence and analysis, when he was abruptly dismissed from the army in 1983.

"I was kicked out," he said.

During a routine security check, it was discovered that Even was living with a man.

"Sodomy laws were still in effect when I was serving in the army, and were only lifted in 1988. Even after that, there was a written order classifying gays as a security risk and thus barring them from certain ranks or units.

"That was the situation that allowed the army to demote me, remove my security clearance and remove me from my unit once they found out I was sharing my life with another man."

Even, who worked at Israel's nuclear reactor in Dimona until 1968, recounted his story to a Knesset committee on gay rights in 1993.

The prime minister of the day, Yitzhak Rabin, offered to reinstate Even to his rank as a colonel, but Even said he would not consider the offer until the persecution of gays in the military ended.

Shortly afterward, the army changed its rules and homosexuals were no longer subjected to unequal treatment in either recruitment or promotion.

For Even, the current battleground is Israeli family law.

"Non-discrimination laws in the workplace exist, but same-sex couples are still not fully recognized as couples or family units. Many laws have to be rephrased to [acknowledge] gay families. I had to sue Tel Aviv University to receive spousal benefits for my partner. We won in court."

Even's career in politics was short-lived, lasting only several months.

"Orthodox religious parties were vehemently against me on-camera, but cordial off-camera," he said. "I was surprised they behaved so differently in public and private."

The only MKs who refused to ride elevators with him were from Shas, a religious party whose constituency consists mainly of poor Sephardim of North African origin.

Even, who lost his seat in last year's election, has no intention of running for the Knesset in the future.

"I'm not really a politician, but a scientist."

There are no openly gays members of Knesset today, but there are gay MKs, he said without elaborating.

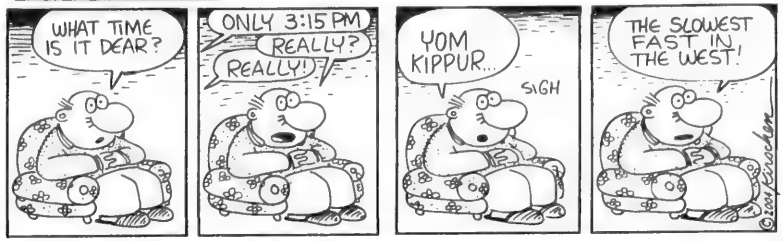
Dry Bones



Stand firm against Iran

After months of indecisive stutter-steps, the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) finally took one very concrete step to confront the government of Iran over that country's secretive and highly suspect nuclear energy program.

The agency's 35-member board of governors cobbled together a compromise resolution that calls upon Iran to stop all uranium enrichment activities, including the manufacture and assembly of centrifuge parts, centrifuge testing and the conversion of uranium into gas – all necessary processes both in the peaceful harnessing of nuclear energy and in the fashioning of a nuclear weapon.

To be sure, the language of the resolution was not the equivalent of a blistering reading of the Riot Act. It was, rather, ambiguously firm. As reported in the New York Times, the Paris-based agency said it "considers it necessary" that Iran halt all of its uranium enrichment programs and meet all of the agency's demands before its Nov. 25 meeting. At that point the board would "decide whether or not further steps are appropriate."

The head of the agency, Mohamed El Baradei, said Iran needs to suspend its enrichment activities "in order to restore confidence" in its peaceful intentions.

Iran is a signatory to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and as such, is entitled to undertake the enrichment of uranium for peaceful purposes. However, it must do so in a manner consistent with the obligations under the treaty, chief among which is the full disclosure to the IAEA of the details of any uranium enrichment program. But Iran has long violated those disclosure obligations. Western governments are convinced that Iran is proceeding full bore, at an expedited pace, to build nuclear weapons.

Not surprisingly, Iran immediately rejected the agency's directive to stop its uranium enrichment activities. It threatened to prohibit further IAEA inspections and to withdraw from the nonproliferation treaty. But the UN, under whose auspices the IAEA operates, and the nations of the West, must not be cowed by Iran's bellicosity. The Iranians will not be deterred from their ambitions of developing nuclear weapons by western equivocation and timidity. But they must be deterred, and the only way to do this is for the IAEA, the UN and the West to stand firm.

and against Sudan

Also last week, the Security Council passed a resolution, 11-0 with four abstentions, threatening the Sudanese government with sanctions if it did not bring about an end to the ethnic violence in the Darfur region of its impoverished country. The council is only authorized to "consider" sanctions against Khartoum should the violence against the black Sudanese not end. But at least the process of accountability has begun. It must be seen through to its finish if the genocide is to end.

Article had personal connection

I look forward to reading The CJN each week. There are always multiple stories of interest. However, the article by Ron Csillag titled "New Book Chronicles Canada's Jewish War Dead" (Sept. 9) touched me on a personal level.

You see, my grandmother, Bert Crosby (née Brown) had an uncle "Brown" who went up to North Bay (I believe in the early 1900s) to run a car dealership. He had two sons who joined Canada's military and perished in the war. I've always been curious to have more details about this branch of the family, but had lost touch with the passing of most of my mother's side of the family.

So it was with great interest that I read in the article that the inspiration for the book on Jewish Canada's contributions to the war effort came from a meeting with "a women named Rose Fluxgold," who asked the author, "When I'm gone, who's going to remember my two brothers?" – Sydney Brown and Zave Brown, both of North Bay. They would have been my grandmother's cousins. I plan to get in touch with Rose, and I thank you for having helped me to reconnect with this branch of the family.

Yearns for more good news on page 1

In front of me is The CJN of Sept. 2. What a nice surprise to look at the front page! "Abella appointed to the Supreme Court." "Gold medal for Israel." "New Israeli envoy arrives next week." It's all good news. No terrorists. No Olympic boycott. No arson attacks. Just good news. Let's hope we can see more front pages like this.

Unfortunate Olympic precedent

Iran qualifies as one of the most despicable and hateful countries in the world.

A Canadian journalist is murdered and no one is convicted in an Iranian Court for her death. Iran continues to support, fund and arm Hezbollah in Lebanon and the terrorist groups operating in the West Bank and Gaza. Last month, in violation of all fundamental Olympic principles, an Iranian athlete was ordered not to compete against an Israeli opponent. Just like the United Nations, the International Olympic Committee (IOC) did nothing to punish Iran, even after hateful statements by the athlete himself and Iran's president.

By not punishing Iran, the UN and the IOC have set an unfortunate precedent for other athletes and teams to refuse to compete against Israel. I suppose the Iranian judo champion was afraid that Israeli perspiration might contaminate him with democratic principles and he would then return to Iran and spread the evil disease of tolerance and understanding.

Where are the club members?

I am enclosing herewith a Bar Mitzvah Club picture, circa 1952-53. The Bais Yehuda Synagogue was located at Dovercourt and Bloor in Toronto, at that time. Over the years, I have located several of the individuals in the picture and given them copies. However, I have not found everyone and wondered if you would be so kind as to post a picture and advise people in the picture, or their families, to get in touch with me so that I may provide them with a copy.

Jews in the Olympics

Sheldon Kirshner's article, "The Olympics: Sports and politics do mix" (CJN, Aug. 26), about the book Jews and the Olympic Games by Paul Taylor, was interesting but had some errors.

He states that in 1936 Helene Mayer gave a "Heil Hitler" salute when the silver medal was placed around her neck. Yet a photo of the salute at the ceremony does not show the medal. The article describes medallist Gyorgy Brody as a soccer goalie, but he was actually one of 12 Jews on the Hungarian water polo team. The Canadian basketball silver medalist was Irving Meretsky (not Maretsky). Incidentally also on that team was Malcolm Wiseman. Not listed as a medalist, but appearing in photographs, in uniform, as a member of the team, was Julius Goldman. The winner of the 1924 100-metres was Harold Abrahams (not Abrams).

The spiritual power of Yom Kippur

By RAHEL MUSLEAH

My friend Anat dreads Yom Kippur. Fasting makes her grumpy, and by morning she already has a headache. Nor does the synagogue setting encourage atonement, meditation or self-reflection for her. As a non-observant Jew, she says, "my relationship with God is such that I can't even begin to atone for what I do – nor do I want to. What's left are my relationships with other people – and I try to take care of those on a daily basis."

Still, says Anat, the strong aura of the day, redolent of childhood and community, draws her to spend Yom Kippur in synagogue. "If this is a holy day I'll treat it as such and stand with others around me. Every year I think about the millions of people who are doing exactly what I am doing on Yom Kippur. It doesn't matter how secular I am. This is my commitment as a Jew."

For another friend, Betsy, Yom Kippur is part of the flow of fall holidays, which reminds her of a "vinyasa," a series of yoga movements. The holiday vinyasa includes planning such as buying clothes for the kids, organizing and making meals, housing out-of-town guests, deciding who's making the break-fast meal and scheduling sukkah-building.

"After all the practical and logistical issues are dealt with, we go to synagogue and there is nothing else to be done but focus on the spiritual," says Betsy. "It's really a relief in many ways. The singing, standing up, sitting down, swaying and praying – that is just the vehicle to bring my energies into a spiritual focus."

Preparing for Yom Kippur would surpass Passover in degree of difficulty if we did it the way Jewish tradition envisioned. It's an inner cleansing rather than an external scouring, beginning in Elul, the month before Rosh Hashanah. Few rituals surround Yom Kippur itself. The biblical injunction states: "Ve-initem et nafshoteichem" – You shall afflict your souls – so food, sex, bathing and adorning ourselves are forbidden. Yet, the Mishnah calls Yom Kippur one of the most joyous days of the year. Maimonides interprets the rules not as denying the body its needs, but as giving it the opportunity for rest and re-creation.

It's customary to wear white (some don a kittel), which emphasizes sameness and purity, and lessens the focus on appearance. "Standing without all the colors we surround ourselves with gives us transparency. We don't cover over who we are," says Gail Twersky Reimer, editor of Beginning Anew: A Woman's Companion to the High Holy Days and director of the Jewish Women's Archive in Brookline, Mass.

Many also avoid leather. "Yom Kippur is the one day it's cool to wear a suit with sneakers – leather or not. It distinguishes the day as different from any other synagogue day," says Rabbi Michael Strassfeld, author of A Book of Life: Embracing Judaism as a Spiritual Practice.

The lack of ritual makes Yom Kippur's power elusive for many. No huge feast demands hours in the kitchen, unless we plan an elaborate break-fast meal. Then there's a whole day meant to be spent in synagogue with an unfamiliar prayerbook and its words of judgment, lists of sins, talk of life and death. How do we make meaning from the holiest but most daunting day on the Jewish calendar?

"To approach Yom Kippur without the context of the other holidays and special times around it is like trying to isolate a wave in the sea," says Rabbi Alan Lew, author of This is Real and You Are Completely Unprepared: The Days of Awe as a Journey of Transformation. "There is the daily contemplation of Elul; slichot services the week before Rosh Hashanah; Rosh Hashanah itself; then 10 days of active transformation. Yom Kippur is the grand finale."

"Yom Kippur only works if there is a process of stock-taking and tshuvah prior to the day itself," agrees Rabbi Irwin Kula, president of CLAL, the National Jewish Center for Learning and Leadership. "There's no shortcut." Rabbi Kula stresses that the joyful component of Yom Kippur comes from doing "good inner work. The more vulnerable you are, the more trusting you are, the more joyful you are."

Rabbi Lew, however, views Yom Kippur's solemnity as outweighing its joyfulness, even simulating a near-death experience. "You wear white or a shroud-like kittel; you abstain from life-affirming actions. The liturgy is full of death and the fragility of life." The nearness of death has its purpose, he says. "It is a great source of vision, a way to make the truth of our lives crystal clear." Rabbi Strassfeld notes: "We all die. Once we face this ultimate truth, we can decide how we want to live life."

For those who love eating, fasting can also be challenging. Its drama has enticed authors to weave stories around it. The Shalom Aleichem story A Yom Kippur Scandal tells of a theft in the synagogue on Yom Kippur. Everyone assents to a search, except young Lazer Yussel, who is reputedly "perfect in everything." When he is searched against his will, his pockets reveal "a couple of well-gnawed chicken bones and a few dozen prune pits, still moist from chewing!" The money, alas, is never found.

"Fasting reminds you that you're human – mind, soul, heart and body," says Rabbi Strassfeld. Paradoxically, because you're not eating, "you spend a bunch of time thinking about eating."

Many religions use fasting to cleanse the body in order to sharpen the mind. "Fasting is an important way to feel our own privilege," says Reimer. "We have a choice whether to eat– but that's not a choice we all have. I use fasting to identify with people who don't have enough." As a child of survivors, Reimer grew up with stories of her parents living on a slice of bread a day – or less. Reimer's congregation, the Worship and Study Congregation of Harvard Hillel, follows Kol Nidre with an appeal for Project Bread, which feeds the hungry. The haftarah satisfies Reimer's sensitivity toward social justice. "It says that all the outside ritual is unimportant; all that matters is reaffirming our concern for others, our commitment to care for the needy, the outcast and those who are less fortunate."

Not all the readings are as easy for her to relate to. Reimer's book grew out of her perception that despite the centrality of women in High Holy Day readings (notably Sarah, Hagar, Hannah and Rachel during Rosh Hashanah), their voices were overlooked. The Yom Kippur afternoon Torah reading, an array of sexual prohibitions from Leviticus, alienates some women, so the Reform movement has substituted the holiness code from Leviticus. Others struggle with the image of God as a judgmental king. "Being 'judged' as deficient by an outside force is less powerful than looking at myself and asking what I can do better," says Reimer.

Rabbi Strassfeld offers an alternative interpretation of Yom Kippur as Yom Ha-Din, the Day of Judgment. "I translate the word 'din' as limitation. That is one of the interpretations of the kabbalistic sefirah of din. Yom Kippur then becomes a time to face our own limitations and confront our own mortality."

Rabbi Lew reassures those whose minds wander during services, saying it actually heightens awareness. "Your mind wanders, you try to bring your focus back to the siddur, your mind wanders again, you bring it back again. This is the same as the process of focusing during meditation or deep spiritual activity."

Staying focused is hard work – even for rabbis. Rabbi Kula suggests honing in on one word or phrase, then connecting with the experience behind it. "If you want a deep experience on Yom Kippur and the clergy doesn't facilitate it, you can do it yourself," he says. "The texts are simple. Who shall live and who shall die. What does this means to you? You can't make a wrong meaning" Even if you attend services out of obligation, once you're there, don't waste the time, he says. But, he cautions, "many don't want a deep experience because it is destabilizing and uncomfortable."

The distinctive High Holy Day melodies provide another spiritual pathway. Some synagogues use wordless melodies – niggunim – to access emotion without verbal impediment. For Rabbi Strassfeld, a highlight is singing Avinu Malkeinu (Our father our king) in unison.

Therein lies another of Yom Kippur's paradoxes. As alone as we are supposed to be, most of us need the comfort of community. "The danger of self-reflection is feeling like a terrible person," says Rabbi Strassfeld. "That's why the confessional (Ashamnu, Bagadnu) is in the plural. We have been guilty. We have dealt falsely. That's why we confess sins we haven't done. The balancing act is not to feel like miserable failures, but also not to ignore our failures. You find compassion towards yourself when you realize that like you, everyone is imperfect." The story of Jonah that we read on Yom Kippur emphasizes that balance. "Jonah is only focused on himself," says Rabbi Strassfeld. "The book's message is you also have to care for others."

Karen (not her real name), a Jewish educator in Chicago, trades community for spiritual satisfaction. Instead of attending a large traditional synagogue, she spends Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur at the vast beach on Lake Michigan. When she moved to Chicago, the shul she joined couldn't replicate the small, close-knit community she grew up in. She persevered through services so she could be a role model to her children until they matured. Her youngest son, 18, now joins her at the beach, where they sing everything out loud.

"We're the only ones there, except for the seagulls… We joke that's our community, our board of directors. When we do tashlich – throwing the bread that symbolizes our sins into the lake on the second day of Rosh Hashanah – there's nothing like watching the gulls swoop down and fly away with them. If that's not redemptive what is? We really do get a fresh start." Karen does feel the loss of community, so to achieve a balance, she attends Kol Nidre services.

The sense of joyful community is often most palpable at Neilah, the closing service that articulates the powerful metaphor of the gates closing. My sister Flora Yavelberg remembers our father, a rabbi in a Sephardi synagogue, striding to the ark to chant the opening hymn Kel Nora Alilah (God of Awe) and beginning to sing in a triumphant voice. "When I recited the Amidah silently," she recalls, "I got a chill as I noticed all the kotveinus – 'inscribe us in the Book of Life' – turned into chotmeinus– 'seal us in the Book of Life.'"

The service ends with the shofar blast, primitive and "powerful beyond the rational," says Rabbi Strassfeld. "You'd think it would be useful to sound the shofar during all of Yom Kippur, but we are left to ourselves until the end. It's a better conclusion than any words. Rabbinic tradition is ultimately optimistic about human beings and believes change is possible. Yom Kippur ends with a sense of uplift."

Dedication and sacrifice

Every day when I pray, I am aware of the sections that recall our defunct Temple sacrifices. I am aware of the incongruity of these anachronistic texts and of the debate about resurrecting these rituals.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Yet, like so many others, I still say them. Why? Getting ready for Yom Kippur raises the question to another level. Do sacrifices atone for our sins? Or better yet, what point is there to sacrifice?

Repeating the list of sacrifices in daily prayer certainly provides us with an opportunity to remember our illustrious past. The mere recital forges a link with an ancient heritage, one that is seeded in Israel and Jerusalem. Eliminating these sections purges history. Whether or not we intend to restore the tradition, not mentioning it leads to a forgetfulness that does little to enhance our collective existence and memory.

So what are we remembering? Our ancestors – with all their imperfections, their forms of collective worship and celebration, and their close relationship to God – appear before us. We can ask: Was that a time when Israelites exulted in the destruction of animal life, or was something else going on?

I am not sure about their thoughts and intentions, but I wonder how different those rituals were from our own much-heralded celebrations. When we rejoice and share a festive meal with our family and friends, are we not participating in the same kind of activity? Do we not share this special personal, familial or communal coming together for the fundamental celebration of life?

All the Temple sacrifices were offerings to God, but most were eaten by those bringing the offering. So a personal or familial observance was marked by a trip to Jerusalem – a good starting point. (I wish we still performed that part of the celebration.) Next, the celebrant was meant to bring the animal or bread before God. That ritual presence begs the question of what is being brought close: the object or the Jew. And perhaps here is the crux of the matter. Temple sacrifices were intended to be a form of individual dedication. The exercise was a declaration and an expression of devotion to the basic structure of the tradition, to the values and goals of our heritage. Those objectives surely apply today.

I don't intend to argue here in favour of renewed Temple sacrifices. Instead, I wish to raise the issue of our own personal offerings and national sacrifices. I want to look at the ways we celebrate today in order to reconnect with that sense of sanctity and dedication that our ancestors had. I wish to invest in that holiness of place and time and retrieve it for myself during these holy days.

Shanah tovah.

War of the worlds

Occidentalism: the West in the Eyes of Its Enemies, by Ian Buruma and Avishai Margalit, is a series of short essays on the perceptions today's Islamists, and the terrorists that carry out their dreadful theologies, have of the West. The recent hideous attack on the children of Beslan is just one expression of "Occidentalism" in action. How, we ask, could it happen? This book gives us insights.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

The story is a tale "of the spread of bad ideas," as East met West. Occidentalism, the authors argue is the "dehumanizing picture of the West as painted by its enemies" – "a hateful caricature of western modernity."

All the things we associate with the modern western world are perceived as evil. The city is filled with arrogant, greedy and decadent people, chief among them the Jews. The country, by contrast, is filled with "warm human bonds," a life with "deep meaning and faith."

Occidentalists consider the western mind capable only of cold scientific thought and secular rationalism, the opposite of the eastern mind, which can contemplate God and the mystical body of the people and the church – or mosque.

The bourgeoisie are, as a class, selfish, grasping and comfortable, the grey opposite of the warrior hero ready to die for the ideals of God and country.

The infidel is a sub-human creature to be crushed like an insect.

Democratic states are artificial, rational, racially hybrid, materialistic societies, and "lousy with Jews." By contrast, the ideal Islamist ruler is there to "impose morality in the public space," not allow freedom of the individual or consult with the governed.

"Terror in the name of God" is permissible, since it is perpetrated against non-humans. If this sounds a lot like the Nazi ideal, it is. Students on buses, women and children at a school assembly, citizens of all races and creeds at work in the twin towers, are fair targets. They are not quite human – they are infidels, they are Jews.

Sayyid Qutb, one of the seminal Arab thinkers who concocted "Occidentalism," was shocked by his 1948 visit to the United States and horrified by something as innocuous as a church dance. He returned home to write vigorously against the West and give form to formless resentment of it.

"Like all dreams of purity," write Buruma and Margalit, "his ideal of the spiritual community was a fantasy, which contained the seeds of violence and destruction."

Qutb's philosophies went a long way to constructing the framework for Islamist terror to build upon.

One of the Palestinians' greatest tragedies (among so many) was their advocate Edward Said, whose most famous moment may have come when he pitched a jubilant stone over the Lebanese-Israeli border after Israel's withdrawal from southern Lebanon. Said rejected Oslo and all other attempts to reconcile Palestinian aspirations with Israeli realities. Whatever mistakes Israel has made – and they are not few – Said, as a spokesperson in the West, failed his people miserably by toeing his consistently hard line. He could have been a reconciler, but instead he was to his dying day a stumbling block.

Said ascribed "Orientalism" – the title of his infamous book – to the West's complete inability, at all times and through all scholarships, to understand and study the "East." Despite the fact Bernard Lewis completely demolished his thesis, Said's influence lingers, devaluing the many scholars (fluent in many "eastern" languages) who have contributed so much to our understanding of the histories of many disparate peoples.

With Occidentalism, Buruma and Margolit have evened things up. Unlike Said's tirade, their book is solid scholarship, devoid of polemics. The problem – if it is a problem – is that the authors see no quick answer to the terror being inflicted on so many innocents, given the Islamists' deep hatred of the West and its democracy, freedom and secular approach to civil society.

Secularism– the separation of church and state, the freedom to choose or reject a religion, the increasingly powerful role of women, the multiculturalism of the city, the economic success of the "West" – in short, the very elements of our society that we proudly proclaim as triumphs of modernity, are anathema to the Islamists. As their societies fail, dragging millions into poverty and ignorance, they have become increasingly violent and careless with human life. Holy War is their weapon, and, for a long time to come, the West's misfortune.

The importance of 'community'

The concept of community has always been an important influence in identifying norms of appropriate behaviour, in peer recognition and, generally, in setting and monitoring common objectives.

But equally importantly, belonging to a community provides vital psychological comfort, even well-being, for the members of that community.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

We in Canada are fortunate. As Jews, we have vibrant and active Jewish communities. We also have opportunities to share in the experience of other communities – artistic, athletic, youth, seniors, professional and multicultural, to name a few.

Canadian society has been correctly described as a community of communities, and the Jewish community in particular offers many choices. We may belong to the organized religious segments of the community or participate in the various institutions and agencies that explore other aspects of our culture. We may belong to a Yiddish club, a youth organization, a Jewish book club. A plethora of opportunities is available, especially in the larger Jewish communities.

But there are many places around the world where Jews strive to establish a sense of community or to revive the vestiges of previously vibrant and healthy communities.

Consider, for example, Kulanu ("all of us"), an organization established to provide support to small, struggling Jewish communities in many countries around the world. The organization's motto – "Helping lost Jewish communities" – essentially sums up its activities.

From its headquarters in Silver Spring, Md., its newsletter outlines topics ranging from a pilgrimage to Portugal, to the protection of an endangered cemetery in India, to the sale of challah covers made in Ghana. Kulanu's raison d'être underscores the need for support for small, lost or rapidly disappearing Jewish communities around the world.

This summer, while visiting our daughter in Trinidad, I first became interested in the history of that country's small, struggling Jewish community, its present status and, of course, its future.

I read Mordechai Arbell's The Jewish Nation of the Caribbean, which outlines the Spanish-Portuguese Jewish settlements in the Caribbean. Arbell discusses the history of Jewish settlement in Martinique, Guadeloupe, French Guyana, Surinam, Curacao, Barbados and other islands. It is fascinating to recognize the surnames of prominent North Americans whose families descended from those areas.

One can further read a history of Trinidad and Tobago's Jewish community published by the International Association of Jewish Genealogical Societies, and a piece by Nicole Bland titled The Lost Calypso Shtetl: Trinidad's Jewish Community. Today only a tiny number of Jews remains – 25 to 67 – significantly fewer than the "Trini" Jewish population of 600 in 1939.

The few Jews remaining in Port of Spain are trying, however, to search out their roots and rediscover their sense of community while keeping a low profile for security reasons. They have established a "congregation," B'nai Shalom – a congregation without a synagogue or prayer books, one that does not hold services.

These Jews are trying to create a revitalized sense of community by meeting in people's homes and reconnecting to the multifaceted nature of Jewish culture. Among the planned activities are a cooking night, a Jewish book night and a family Chanukah party.

This summer, I was fortunate to be present at a Jewish music night where traditional, forgotten melodies, as well as new ones, were shared. There were Shabbat songs, Israeli songs, children's songs – something to appeal to everyone. Those present included an artist, a merchant and others who wished to re-ignite a light from the past or discover and build a musical bridge to tomorrow.

On returning to Canada, I was, however, reminded that we do not have to travel far to realize that there are lost, lonely, small Jewish communities throughout Canada. Indeed, the Canadian Jewish Congress has for years attempted to address their particular concerns.

But even in the larger cities, outside our own synagogues and community centres there are many Jews who are not part of the so-called organized Jewish communities. To them, we must extend a welcome, an open door. We have a responsibility to ensure that all persons feel a sense of community, a sense of belonging, and to let all Jews know that we share a bond, a spirit of Kulanu, a community notion embracing "all of us.'

Jews and Poles - a retrospective

Jews and Poles have had a contentious relationship, though this does not mean they have never been on cordial terms. An examination of the historical record, as well as conversations with Jews who lived in Poland before, during and after the Holocaust, serve to underline this thesis.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

There have been periods in Polish history when Jews flourished and anti-Semitism was on the decline. But all too often, particularly after 1918, when Poland finally gained its independence after more than a century of foreign colonization, Polish Jews were the butt of popular prejudice and discriminatory state policies. This is fact, not mere conjecture, the cynical bleats of some Polish apologists notwithstanding.

Leo Cooper, an Australian scholar who left Poland shortly after World War II, has plenty to say about these still-controversial issues in a hard-hitting book, In The Shadow of the Polish Eagle (MacMillan). Cooper surveys the course of Polish-Jewish relations since the 11th century, and pulls no punches. At times, his narrative reads like a catalogue of horrors.

There were Jews in Poland before the advent of Christianity in 966, but an organized Jewish community did not take shape until after the 11th century. In the wake of the Tartar invasion, which devastated the country, the Polish kingdom invited German and Jewish merchants to settle in Poland.

By the Statute of Kalisz in 1264, Jews were granted freedom of commerce, the right to purchase property and a degree of autonomy.

The Roman Catholic Church was none too pleased by these privileges. As Cooper claims: "The entire history of Polish Jewry can be viewed as a perpetual process of growing anti-Semitism instigated by the church."

During the 15th century, the church launched a vigorous anti-Jewish campaign. King Kazimierz IV diluted the Statute of Kalisz, and subsequently, Jews were expelled from Warsaw and Krakow.

In general, however, Polish kings safeguarded the Jewish population. Two examples will suffice. In 1551, King Sigismund August issued an edict granting Jews a large measure of autonomy and allowing them to participate in a wide range of trades and crafts. During the reign of Stefan Batory (1576-86), Jews were permitted to govern themselves through the Council of Four Lands. But in 1764, on the eve of Poland's tragic partition, the Polish diet rescinded the council.

The Polish nobility valued Jews for their commercial abilities, but anti-Jewish animus at the grassroots level smouldered. Throughout the 17th century, Jews were subjected to physical attacks and blood libel trials.

Jews fared relatively well after Poland was carved up. They chafed under severe legal restrictions in the Russian zone, but were given equal rights, more or less, in the Austrian and Prussian spheres of influence. The 1863 insurrection, which was fervently supported by Jews, silenced even anti-Semitic agitators. But pogroms swept through the nation in 1881 and again in 1898.

Cooper contends anti-Semitism was exploited by many Poles as a rallying force of nationalism. Roman Dmowski, the leader of the National Democratic Party (Endeks), believed that Jewish influence should be curtailed. In 1909, he called for an economic boycott against Jews, exhorting his followers to "stick to your own kind."

Post-World War I Poland, Cooper observes, was born in "an anti-Jewish atmosphere." Poland's declaration of independence was followed by a succession of pogroms in cities from Kielce to Lvov. Anti-Semitism grew by leaps and bounds from 1918 to 1939. Restrictive laws were introduced, a numerus clausus at Polish universities was instituted, Polish newspapers spewed anti-Semitism and calls for the expulsion of Jews from Poland were heard.

Under external pressure, Poland had signed the 1919 Minority Treaty, which was designed to protect the rights of national minorities such as Jews, Germans and Ukrainians. But, as Cooper points out, the treaty was observed in the breach. Many Polish Catholics regarded Jews, who comprised about 10 per cent of the overall population, as an alien element who had no legitimate place in Poland. Even assimilated Jews were the object of scorn.

Jozef Pilsudski, who ruled Poland from 1926 until his death in 1935, moderated anti-Jewish trends in Polish society. But the economic crisis that beset Poland from the 1920s onward, and Poland's 1934 non-aggression treaty with Germany, intensified the existing anti-Semitism.

From the 1930s, Jews were deluged by a torrent of anti-Semitic rules and regulations. The ministry of education would only consider applicants of Christian ancestry. The Lodz city council passed a resolution decreeing that only writers and artists who could prove their Christian roots were eligible for subsidies.

According to Cooper, the intelligentsia took the lead in whipping up anti-Semitism. University students were in the vanguard of that movement. In 1936, nationalist students, backed by Poland's primate, issued a declaration from Czestochowa: "We will not rest until the last Jew, alive or dead, has left the Polish soil." Cooper suggests some 60 per cent of university students agreed with that statement.

Succumbing to pressure from student organizations, universities forced Jewish students to sit on segregated classroom seats known as "ghetto benches." Several rectors protested, but their voices were drowned out. To add insult to injury, Jewish students were attacked on campuses, resulting in a few fatalities.

The rising tide of anti-Semitism did not occur in a vacuum. The national unity government that had ruled Poland since 1936 exploited anti-Semitism as an instrument by which to deflect attention away from a panoply of pressing issues. Responding to public opinion, Poland embraced emigration as a method of solving the "Jewish problem." That explains why Poland was so supportive of the Zionist movement. Even the Polish Socialist Party thought the proportion of Jews in the country should be reduced.

Calls for the mass movement of Jews from Poland were accompanied by agitation to "Polonize" the economy. In some towns in the eastern part of the country, almost all commerce was in Jewish hands. Reacting to this demand, the prime minister declared in the Sejm (parliament) that he would welcome an anti-Jewish economic boycott. Cardinal Hlond, the Polish primate, supported it, but warned Catholics not to physically assault Jews.

As these developments unfolded, there was an upsurge of anti-Semitic violence, with pogroms breaking out in Grodno, Przytyk, Minsk Mazowiecki, Brest Litovsk and Czestochowa.

As World War II drew near, a member of the Sejm submitted a motion to strip Jews of their citizenship, and professional associations restricted their membership to Christians.

During the German occupation, the vast majority of Poles displayed indifference toward the suffering of Jews. In his diaries, Adam Czerniakow, the head of the Nazi-appointed Jewish Council in Warsaw, wrote that Poles were sympathetic to the persecution of Jews. True or not, the fact remains that Poles caught helping Jews did so at great risk to themselves and their families and friends.

In a 21-month period between 1942 to 1944, the Germans executed about 200 Poles for hiding Jews. Cooper puts the number of Polish "helpers" at about 160,000 to 360,000.

He writes that the reaction of the Polish underground to the 1943 Warsaw ghetto uprising was, with very few exceptions, "negative and often hostile." Generally, Jews were not accepted into the ranks of the Armja Krajowa (AK), the biggest partisan group.

In post-war Poland, Jews were vulnerable, despite the presence of Jews in the communist regime. More than 1,000 Jews were murdered by anti-Semitic thugs from 1945 to 1946. The pogrom in Kielce, which claimed the lives of 42 Jews, prompted tens of thousands of Jews to emigrate.

Anti-Semitism, capped by an orchestrated anti-Zionist drive in the aftermath of the 1967 Six Day War, continued to plague Poland in the intervening years.

Even after the collapse of communism, the so-called "Jewish question" haunted Poland. In the 1990 presidential campaign, Lech Walesa said that Poles of Jewish origin should declare themselves. Furthermore, anti-Semites in the Solidarity trade union cast aspersions on Prime Minister Tadeusz Mazowiecki's ethnic background.

A reader is sometimes left with the impression that Cooper gives his topic a deliberately negative spin: he presents insufficient data on the positive aspects of the Jewish encounter with Poles. Nevertheless, this is a generally thoughtful book that commands attention.

Dina Wolfe went to Poland in search of her past, returning with a snapshot, left, she never knew existed. She is the child in the photo.

Trip to Poland yields poignant memento

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Dina Wolfe was only two years old when World War II broke out in 1939. "I really didn't have a childhood," says the office manager of the Lodzer Centre Holocaust Congregation, who was born in Warsaw and spent the war years in Siberia and Russia.

To her great astonishment, she found a piece of that childhood this summer when she visited Poland with her daughter Lisa. It happened not in her home town, but about 150 kilometres away in a village called Drohiczyn, where Wolfe's mother had spent her summers with relatives who owned the town's prom (river barge).

The day she visited there, Wolfe persisted in what seemed like a fruitless quest, approaching person after person to ask whether they remembered the prewar owners of the prom.

Finally, a local farmer took her to his septuagenarian aunt, a woman named Lilia who was making blueberry perogies in her kitchen.

When Lilia heard Wolfe's question, her answer was immediate: "You're looking for Shulem and Fraidel." She was their "Shabbos goy," she said, and her father had worked for them on the prom that crossed the Bug River.

"It took my breath away," said Wolfe.

What happened next came as an even greater surprise. "Wait a minute," the woman instructed her, disappearing into a back room.

She emerged with a small, scalloped-edge, black and white picture, dated 1938, of Shulem, Wolfe's mother's cousin, and his wife Fraidel. The couple, of whom Wolfe has only faint memories, were posing at a wooden fence, Shulem behind it and Fraidel perched beside him. Standing near them at the edge of the picture, leaning against Shulem's suit jacket folded neatly over the fence, was a young, curly-haired child.

Recognizing herself from one of the few prewar pictures that had made it to Canada, Wolfe began to tremble and her tears started to flow. "I was so emotional. It validated so much for me."

"It's a very powerful picture," said Rabbi Matthew Kaufman of the Lodzer Centre. "[Through it] she is recovering her lost childhood and her lost innocence. That was the last time she was a child."

Wolfe returned home with a book about the once predominantly Jewish town – a gift from Lilia – and the photograph, promising to return it once she had copies made.

Although Wolfe's meeting with Lilia was a dramatic high point, the entire two-week trip – a 65th birthday gift from her four children, taken two years belatedly – triggered a "hurricane of emotions:" regret that her late parents, who had spoken of Poland often and in detail, could not be there; sadness over what Poland represents; disappointment that she was unable to locate her grandparents' graves in Warsaw's overgrown Jewish cemetery; anger and shock at finding out the tombstones from the Jewish cemetery in Łòkow, her father's town, had been used for construction, mingled with a feeling of being pleased that at least a few stones were salvaged to build a monument; and – most unexpectedly – a sense of homecoming.

Wolfe plans to return to Poland and spend more time with Lilia, who had wanted to take her to see Shulem's mother's house, still standing on the other side of the river. "It was late and I still had to go to the town where my father was born," said Wolfe. "I told her, 'At my first opportunity, I'm going to go back.'"

Group tries to make services relevant

Rabbi Mitch Mandel, director of outreach for Aish Thornhill, just north of Toronto's city limits, was also surprised to hear that survey respondents chose prayer over shofar.

"Wow," he said on hearing the news. "I would have assumed the shofar was the highlight."

Maybe, he suggested, people are so distracted during the year that when it comes to the High Holy Days, the importance of prayer becomes "much more real… [if] it's not something that's part of their lifestyle."

Aish Thornhill runs two beginner-type programs on the High Holy Days. The Toronto branch is not affiliated with NJOP, although they share similar mandates.

For young singles, Aish20s runs services in two locations – Thornhill and Forest Hill. The services use a special machzor, including transliteration of the Hebrew, created by the Association of Jewish Outreach Professionals in conjunction with the Afikim Foundation.

At Aish Thornhill, Rabbi Mandel runs a one-hour "Family Experience," which is not a service. Instead it focuses more on dialogue and the relevancy of holiday themes in the context of participants' lives. "It's much more an interactive, fun experience in terms of keeping kids interested and giving meaning to the parents."

Educational services, Rabbi Mandel said, are designed "with the idea we need to approach people in a much more comfortable, stimulating fashion so that hopefully they're inspired to the point where they want more."

CARD PREPARATION: Grade 5 students at Bialik Hebrew Day School started the year off on a high note with preparations for Rosh Hashanah. They are pictured above, with their teacher Sarah Mourad, displaying the greeting cards they created for their families and friends.

Parents, teachers, bring different views to problem

On top of all that, when parents and teachers are brought into the mix, they also bring differing views. When the issues are left unattended, affected parties get emotional and defensive and the situation worsens to the point that it can take over the entire school agenda.

When a parent becomes aware of a problem, Goldbloom recommends they ask to see their school's bullying policies. Then they need to check on how those policies are implemented.

Records from Toronto's Board of Education indicate that one child in five is victimized periodically during the school year. Canada Safety Council studies also show that teachers only see four per cent of the incidents and that seven out of 10 teachers – but only one in four students – say that teachers intervene when bullying occurs.

Part of this discrepancy arises from the different ideas about of how bullying should be defined. In addition, physical assaults are more likely to be reported, while humiliating verbal attacks are sometimes harder to spot.

As a private institution, each day school has its own code of conduct and is accountable to its individual board of directors for the actions of its administrators. However, since Jewish schools benefit from financial subsidies, teacher training and other services provided by fees and donations from the community, many parents feel that Jewish day schools have a unique role to fulfil and should also have some accountability to the community.

Goldbloom suggested that the school should act as a mediator when bullying problems are reported, and recommended that efforts be made to bring affected parties together.

But for Julie, who was being continuously ridiculed everywhere she turned, the school's intervention was the beginning of the end.

"I dreaded having to meet the girls in the principal's office," Julie said. "I could see them smirking and had this terrible feeling that they would make it worse."

And they did. The bullies spread the virus to the entire school. No one would speak to Julie. School days were long, and the little girl spent her lunch hours talking on the phone, crying and seeking advice from her mother.

Determined to stay in a Jewish educational environment, the family stuck it out. Julie, who has since graduated, isn't sure they made the right decision.

"Part of me didn't want to leave the school because I didn't want those girls to think they had won. I wanted the school to tell them they couldn't come back," Julie said.

But it was a miserable year and without her mother's daily support and advice she isn't sure how she would have managed.

While bullying has always been a part of the school environment, the bullying-related stories of Reena Virk, who was beaten to death in British Columbia, and the tragic deaths of other Canadian teens have forced the issue out of the closet and onto the front pages of our newspapers. Parents, who always knew of the problem, now dread that their own child may be victimized.

When bullying affects their children, they want zero tolerance policies applied so that the abuse ends quickly. However, given the ambiguous nature of many of the events surrounding the bullying incidents, Jewish day schools don't usually suspend or expel students unless a weapon is involved.

Instead, administrators hope they can resolve the problem through counselling – often choosing to focus their attention on the victim – or through mediation, in the hope that by bringing the two sides together they can begin a healing process.

"The school's efforts to mediate the problem between my daughter and the bully only made the problem worse," Julie's mother, Mrs. K, said.

When the school suggested counselling the K. family dismissed the idea, afraid that their daughter would think there was something wrong with her. Despite assurances by the school to the contrary, Mrs. K said the family was nervous the school would use the counsellor's reports to justify asking their child to leave in order to resolve the heated situation.

The confrontations were never resolved and "by the time the school year was over, we felt that our daughter had been verbally beaten up each and every day. And we were all powerless to do anything.

"We felt ashamed that we couldn't do anything about the bullies. But we were afraid that if we moved Julie, she would think that those awful girls were right and she had no place in that school."

Seymour Epstein, the executive director of the Board of Jewish Education of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, does not believe that using zero tolerance policies to expel or suspend children is necessarily the most effective way to deal with bullying problems.

Instead, he advocates reactive policies that make it clear that bullying will not be tolerated in the schools.

At the same time, Epstein also believes schools should pursue a more proactive approach to the issue and integrate anti-bullying curricula into their programs.

"Children should be learning about the subject so that they can be involved in the process when it occurs."

However, Epstein pointed out that if the very environment of the school exemplifies bullying – either through excessive yelling by teachers or by the imposition of inexplicable rules by the administration – then students will have a harder time understanding what is expected from them.

Once a bullying incident is reported, Epstein believes the schools must deal with the incident according to Jewish texts that clearly state that we have an obligation to protect the weaker members of our society.

Will the next generation recognize this?

Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning will ensure they do!

The High Holy days find many of us feeling a heightened awareness of our Jewish faith, heritage and traditions. It is a time of family and friends, a time for inner reflection and outer celebration. Increasingly though, too many of our people are not remembering, are not celebrating, are not participating.

Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, through innovative outreach programs works to strengthen connections and/or re-connect Jews to their faith, heritage and community. We are unique in reaching out to all segments of our community and our work is all the more urgent as assimilation threatens our community's viability.

Kolel is a leader in reconnecting those who are searching for answers. We bridge the gap for those disconnected Jews and give them the tools to find their own "Jewish Way". As an independent community institution, we bring together teachers and students from diverse backgrounds and experiences to explore Jewish thought and teachings in a pluralistic and egalitarian setting. Few organizations match our depth and programming.

But, we need your help to do more outreach, teaching and programs. For generations the shofar has called our community together in times of celebration and at times of peril. When you support Kolel you also support our community. Ensure that the sound of the shofar will be a time of celebration for the next generation.

Toronto students begin the year as advocates for Israel

By REBECCA GLUCK SOBERMAN
UJA Federation

Fresh from a 16-day leadership training program in Israel this summer, eight students attending Toronto area universities or colleges are now prepared to apply much of their training on campuses across the city.

National Jewish Campus Life (NJCL) and Canada Israel Experience, two national agencies supported by UJA Federation, worked in partnership with Hasbara Fellowships, a program spearheaded by Aish HaTorah. The partners built a high level experience aimed at creating effective advocacy based on the CIC (Canada-Israel Committee) "Shared Values" agenda. The agenda engages Canadians by demonstrating shared values and experiences with Israelis as the most effective means of supporting Israel.

For Hagit Levy, a student at York University and a program participant, it was "a once in a lifetime opportunity."

Hagit Levy

Levy, along with 34 Canadian students -- many of whom live in the Toronto area -- from 20 campuses, experienced Israel's natural beauty, colourful citizens, and the current situation. Every activity on the schedule incorporated a learning session to provide a complete and accurate image of Israel, including its strengths and challenges.

"We went on a hike in the Golan and rafting on the Jordan river…Later we climbed a hill and overlooked the Valley of Tears, which Zvi, our guide, explained was where part of the Yom Kippur battle was fought and where the Syrians surrendered," Levy recounts. The ongoing educational component allowed Levy to fully appreciate the leisure activity. "I couldn't help feeling lucky and grateful to have the Golan and other parts of Israel," she says.

The program included many workshops, as well as sessions on Jewish identity, the Canadian Jewish community, and in-depth guided tours of strategic areas like the Golan, the Lebanese border, the seam line with the security fence, and the Jerusalem area.

Students interacted with a number of high profile politicians including Israel's Labour Party leader Shimon Peres and Ra'anan Gissin, spokesman for Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who offered opposing political views. As well, the group visited a border police base responsible for guarding Israelis living near the Green Line and received a briefing on terrorist tactics.

"What really struck me was seeing the actual equipment that terrorists use, such as bombs, guns, and knives. And learning that some terrorists inject themselves with diseases like hepatitis and HIV before committing suicide showed how barbaric this terror is," Levy explains.

The group had an intimate meeting with terror victim Steve Averbach in his home. Averbach is a quadriplegic as a result of a suicide attack in the Jerusalem suburb of French Hill on Bus #6 last year. For Levy, the impact was overpowering. "The experience showed me that the security fence is crucial to Israel's survival and every possible step must be taken to ensure safety," she says.

Victim of terror Steve Averbach speaks to NJCL Hasbara Fellows.

Levy's impressions at the conclusion of the mission demonstrate the goal of the program. "Listening to all the lectures, as well as having all the workshops, has given me this unbelievable burst of energy and pride to be a Jew and to defend Israel. Now I have the tools, the knowledge to understand this situation, and the ability to speak for Israel."

Empowering a new generation to deal with anti-Israel hatred is an important component of UJA Federation Campaign 2005.

Toronto man, 104, still going strong

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Sam Rotish is clearly a man of his word. The Toronto resident, who celebrated his 104th birthday this summer, claims that one of the keys in leading a long, productive and good Jewish life is change.

"The world doesn't stand still for any of us," says Rotish. "We must always be prepared to change with it."

And perhaps nobody knows that better than Rotish. Born in Kiev on July 20, 1900 – during Wilfred Laurier's term as prime minister of Canada – Rotish has always changed with the times.

From his early days growing up in Toronto's Junction community on Dundas Street West, to his days as a retailer in Oshawa, Rotish today remains a vibrant, intelligent, and well-respected member of Toronto's Jewish community.

Sam Rotish, 104, shares a smile with wife Ann, 96.

At age 25, Rotish and his late first wife Bertha packed up their belongings and moved to Oshawa where he opened a men's wear shop.

"I was on the Oshawa UJA Committee for years and years," he says, "We always did very good work for the Jewish community. I remember giving much of my time to a Jewish cemetery there, as well as a synagogue that needed help."

Unfortunately, not all was perfect in Oshawa as Sam and Bertha experienced – firsthand – the antisemitism of that era.

"For the most part, we had a great life in Oshawa," he says. "But there were only about 15 to 20 Jewish couples there then, and you knew that there was antisemitism. It was obvious because there were signs up all over the place saying 'No Jews or dogs allowed.' It wasn't uncommon."

After his first wife passed away in 1970, Rotish "went to pieces," sold his home in Oshawa, and moved back to Toronto to be closer to his children.

He met Ann a couple of years later while on vacation in Florida and the rest is history. The loving couple celebrated their 30th anniversary earlier this month.

Ann, 96, also born in the former Soviet Union, has been a regular donor to UJA Federation's annual campaign for the past 50 years, and still worries about a resurgence of antisemitism today.

"I have a few grandchildren, so sure, I worry about antisemitism. When I was a very young girl, we never had anything like what UJA is doing today, especially this campaign. It's so important to educate our youngsters about antisemitism, Israel and what being Jewish is all about."

Recently, he was given an aliyah at Beth Tzedec Congregation in honour of his latest birthday.

"Sam Rotish is a shul mensch and a community Jew," says Beth Tzedec's rabbi Baruch Frydman Kohl. "It's not only his age, but his vigor, his vitality, and his outlook on life that endears him to people of all generations in the congregation. He and his wife Ann are deeply Jewish with grace and graciousness, and we hope that he has many more years surrounded by those who love him."

"It's important that my parents raised me and my brothers as good, proper Jewish boys, with proper Jewish values," says the energetic centenarian.

New centre named in honour of late philanthropist

Philanthropist Shirley Granovsky and Bryan Keshen, Executive Director, Miles Nadal JCC, took a recent construction-site tour of the soon to open Phil Granovsky Sports and Recreation Centre located in the downtown Miles Nadal JCC. The sports and recreation Centre has been made possible by a generous donation from Shirley Granovsky, who is honoring her late husband Phil Granovsky through this gift. The Phil Granovsky Sports and Recreation Centre will be opening November, this year.

Despite hurricanes, federations continue to provide services

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Despite the fact that southern Florida – home to five hundred thousand Jews - continues to be battered by an intense hurricane season, the state's Jewish federations continue to deliver important community services to their citizens.

Gale force winds from Hurricane Frances batter the East coast of Florida including these trees in West Palm Beach. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Earlier this month, Hurricane Frances' 115-mile-per-hour winds downed trees, caused major flooding and left shortages of necessities such as water, ice, and gas in the central part of the state and the Florida Panhandle.

Frances followed on the heels of Hurricane Charley, which left almost US$7 million in damages in its wake. The storm badly damaged a synagogue school in Port Charlotte on Florida's western coast, and left some 1,000 Jewish families homeless. One Jewish resident, a senior, was reportedly killed by the storm. The indigent victim was given a proper Jewish funeral thanks to fundraising efforts.

"Hurricane Frances impacted directly on four Jewish federations: Boca Raton, Palm Beach County, Brevard County and Daytona Beach," says Barry Swartz, vice president of UJA Consulting, who staffs the UJC emergency committee, chaired by Carol Smokler, a resident of Palm Beach County. UJC is the umbrella organization for 155 Jewish federations across North America. "The federations have all had to deal with flooding, intermittent phone service, debris, fallen trees, heat and humidity."

While the Daytona Beach Federation retained electricity after Hurricane Frances and its doors remain opened, the other three were forced to close down.

Despite the problems caused by the ongoing storms, Jewish communal services continue to proceed, albeit at a reduced level.

"Florida's federations continue to deliver their important services by operating out of makeshift locations, the gymnasiums at Jewish community centres, synagogues, and the like," says Swartz. "But also, Federations are getting things done by working with other relief organizations, such as the Red Cross, FEMA (the Federal Emergency Management Service), as well as with state and local authorities."

During the run of Hurricane Charley, the Jewish Federation of Lee and Charlotte Counties successfully set up a management team of volunteers to oversee the collection of necessary supplies including food, psychological counseling, cash assistance, a phone bank to find missing people, and emergency housing

One man who has been experiencing Frances' wrath firsthand is Jeff Klein, CEO of the Federation of Palm Beach County

"The storm was the size of the state of Texas, with howling winds literally ripping huge trees from the ground which downed power lines," says Klein. "It's been a very difficult, traumatic time for many of our Jewish residents. Many of them – rich and poor alike – have had to be evacuated, taken to hotels, friends, or shelters. Right now there are more than 50,000 residents in shelters. Still, while it's been terrible, it hasn't been catastrophic."

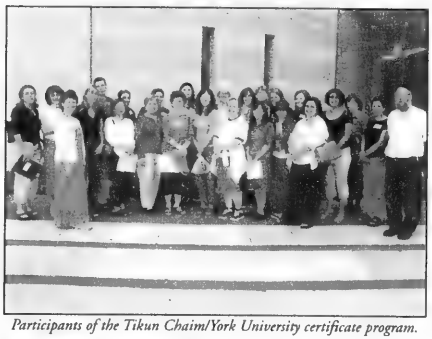
Toronto residents who want to check on friends or relatives in Florida whom they have been unable to contact can email Janis Roth at JIAS Toronto at jroth@jias.org who will forward your request.

BJE offers unique certification program in special education

By REBECCA GLUCK SOBERMAN
UJA Federation

Tikun Chaim, the Special Education initiative of UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education, in conjunction with York University, has pioneered its first comprehensive certificate program in special education for teachers in the Jewish school system. Tikun Chaim was established in 2001, combining funds that UJA Federation designated for special education with a generous donation from the New Berman Fund.

"The new certificate program is truly a collaborative effort," says Bev Freedman, coordinator of leadership development for York University's Faculty of Education. For the last year she has worked closely with Tikun Chaim porgram coordinator Dafna Ross, Debbie Gladstone, director of Tikun Chaim, and Dori Levine, Tikun Chaim's senior consultant.



Participants of the Tikun Chaim/York University certificate program.

"It has also been an exceptional experience to draw upon the expertise of Professor Alex Pomson, who assisted us in the initial stages to create this academic, Ontario Ministry-accredited program," says Ross. "This important initiative has evolved from, and is designed specifically to respond to our schools' needs," she adds.

"In the Jewish community, there is a growing understanding of the responsibility to educate all our children," says Gladstone.

The course is designed to equip teachers with the knowledge and skills necessary to address the needs of all children in their classrooms. Special education encompasses a wide spectrum of students from those with severe learning issues to high ability learners, commonly referred to as "gifted."

The 25 participants, chosen from 50 applicants, began the program with an intensive summer institute at York University. The group will continue to meet on a weekly basis throughout this academic year.

The class will have access to a number of exceptional guest instructors, as well as Dafna Ross and Dori Levine as instructional leaders and the teachers apply their course studies immediately to the classroom. "It was essential to ensure a hands-on, practicum component to the course," says Gladstone.

Rhona Shulman, chair of the Tikun Chaim Advisory Committee, shares her enthusiasm. "It was extremely rewarding to attend the opening session with the participants, and to hear how important it was for them to join this program."

"I applaud the efforts of all involved, especially the consultants at Tikun Chaim. We expect great things from this unique initiative in special education," says Lisa Millar, Durham Board of Education Administrative Officer and member of the program's planning committee.

From the Chair

A time for collective action

By LESLIE GALES
Chair, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto

Leslie Gales

One of the most inspiring aspects of the High Holiday period is the extent to which it unites millions of Jews in thousands of cities around the world. Over the same span of time, all of us seek to improve our lives and, fortunately, in our community, so many of us do so much to offer Jews in need a fresh start.

Our UJA dollars, donated generously by each and every one of us truly transform lives. And it's not just here in Toronto, in Canada or in Israel. Your gifts even make a significant difference to small Jewish communities around the world.

We learned, for example, during a recent Baltic trip with my family, about the most basic needs faced by small Baltic communities. They require help just to maintain their Jewish community centres which often double as synagogues. They have no significant population to support any sort of Jewish communal life as we know it, and intermarriage is diluting the very small Jewish presence that already exists.

We learned, as well, that Baltic Jews face antisemitism, like so many Jews around the world, but, sadly, the antisemitism they currently experience is actually viewed as an improvement over the previous Communist regime.

And all of the Jewish leaders we encountered are worried about the growth of Europe's Muslim population.

So the situation certainly isn't looking good for the Jews of Europe.

But there's always hope, especially at this time of year - hope provided by UJA Federation's overseas partner organizations – the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC).

JAFI, funded by the Federation network, is the powerful force behind aliyah for Jews starting new lives in Israel and the JDC is responsible for preserving and enhancing the quality of Jewish life in the world's far-flung regions.

We should feel proud, as a community, to stand beside Jews who need our support anywhere and everywhere, whether it's the underprivileged, Israel's victims of terror, those who are increasingly assaulted by worldwide antisemitism or a new generation seeking the means to deal with this preponderance of hatred.

That's what UJA Federation's current Campaign 2005 is all about. Your campaign contribution is an inspiring act of Jewish unity that strengthens all of us.

David Engel, UJA Federation's Vice Chair and I wish you, your loved ones and the entire Jewish people a joyous, peaceful New Year.

A hurricane's New Year lesson

By RABBI AVRAHAM E. PLOTKIN

Rabbinic Reflections

It was the other day, while standing under the wedding canopy, officiating at the wedding of a young bride and groom, when I stumbled on a simple yet profound thought. Facing the young couple, I spontaneously asked them: "Tell me, do you have any thoughts on what we can learn from Charley?"

To say the least, they looked pretty baffled. I started to explain to them that Charley, the hurricane that, in August, brought destruction and devastation to much of Florida, ironically came with an amazing lesson in life.

"What was it about Hurricane Charley that made it so unique, making it a hurricane of historic proportions?

"It was the unusual fact that although Charley did not hit any large populated city, it was nonetheless extremely devastating. Charley cut right through dozens of trailer parks on the Gulf Coast, toppling trailers and blowing their debris all over. The reason why the aftermath of Charley was so horrific and extreme was because the trailer homes had inadequate, inferior foundations.

"You see, my dear bride and groom, a foundation is unlike any other part of the building. There is nothing glamorous about a foundation. It sits beneath the ground and is invisible. But without proper foundations, a building is at risk.

"You, too, my dear bride and groom must view your wedding as the foundation of your future married life. Take the time in building a healthy foundation. If you fail to do so, well, that is as reckless as renting a trailer home and parking it in a Florida trailer park, with Charley on the horizon.

"Like a foundation that is not beautiful, glamorous or visible but is the real strength of the edifice, you, too, must build your marriage on strength, not glamour. Base your marriage on the time-honoured and proven values of the Torah. The Torah is the foundation of all foundations; it is solid like a rock [see Maimonides' opening remarks to his magnum opus, Mishne Torah].

"Now is the time for you to make a joint commitment to build your home on the rock-solid values of your ancestors. Make sure to build a kosher home with mezuzot on all the doors. Infuse your home with the observances of Shabbat and yom tov and fill your festive table with many guests. Surround yourself with books of Torah and take the time to read them. Place a pushke or charity box in a prominent place to help the poor and our brethren in Israel."

Driving home after the wedding, I realized that the wedding's theme could also be used for the basis of a High Holy Day sermon. The sermon would address one of the greatest mysteries of Jewish life: Why is there such a disproportionate amount of emphasis placed on merely three days of the year?

Like a wedding, the High Holy Days are more than just a beginning. They are actually the foundation of the rest of the year. The strength of the High Holy Days will determine the fate of the rest of the year.

As the year progresses, we are certain to encounter all sorts of challenges that will threaten our stability and very existence. By building a proper foundation for the year, we are guaranteed that we will have the needed strength to withstand these challenges and stormy winds.

The High Holy Days are this special time when we pour the foundation of the year. Through meaningful observances and heartfelt prayers together with family and friends, we secure a happy and healthy year.

Once our foundations are successfully in place over these High Holy Days, we will then say to this hurricane or, for that matter, to any other brewing storm – "Goodbye, Charley."

Shanah Tovah.

Rabbi Avraham E. Plotkin is the spiritual leader and executive director of Chabad Lubavich of Markham.

Understanding Israel's plight

By STANLEY PLOTNICK

Guest Voice

There is no place on earth that challenges the emotions as much as Israel, at least for the many of us who care so deeply about the future of both the state and the Jewish people, which to me are intertwined.

Joy quickly descends into depression, which can rebound into exalted pride, only to be replaced by anxiety. Excitement can change into trepidation. Laughter can quickly become tears of joy or sadness.

Israel does all of this to me.

I never want to not experience the emotional roller-coaster, unless that means experiencing peace, security and all the wonderful associated emotions. But until that is possible, I will gladly ride the roller-coaster.

Regardless of the number of times one has travelled to Israel, there is no more wonderful feeling than arriving there. We truly feel we are "coming home" to "chez nous." There is an exhilaration in being part of a majority that shares values, aspirations and mutual concern.

There is an immediate comfort in hearing Hebrew being spoken (even though I understand so little) and greetings of "Shanah Tovah" exchanged between friends and strangers. There is a security in feeling that you are in a society that is determined to ensure the future of the Jewish people, a society that is not critical or envious of our successes and does not gloat at our failures. It is family – mishpachah – in the most wonderful sense, and we feel it in our hearts and soul within minutes of arriving.

Our pride is unabated when we consider what has been accomplished in this land in less than 60 years: the skyscraper skyline of Tel Aviv; the growing magnificence of Jerusalem; the forests and farmlands where desert once prevailed; the excellence of the facilities and professionals in its universities and hospitals; the excellence of its research and technology facilities and the talent within them; the ability of cities in the Negev to blossom; the achievements of individuals who immigrated to Israel within the past decade; and, most of all, the knowledge that we are always welcome at any time and for any reason.

Of course, the excitement is tempered when speaking to victims of the Be'er Sheva bus bombing or the relatives of those who were murdered. But there is also inspiration in their resolve to press on and in the incredible support offered by family, friends, professionals, strangers and institutions.

There is an immediate comfort in hearing Hebrew being spoken

It is not possible to sublimate the sadness and the pain of listening to the mother of the four-year-old who was killed while he sat on her lap on a bus home from the supermarket. She spent years at a clinic attempting invitro-fertilization. Now she can never have another child.

In empathizing with the victims of terror, we have a better appreciation for what average Israelis live with and how their courage and risk-taking keep this remarkable country available to us and reinforce our posture and position throughout the Diaspora.

Terrorism has brought enormous suffering on the people of Israel, something the world has refused to understand. Sadly, it has taken both an escalation and a widening of terrorist madness to develop some comprehension for Israel's plight.

When terrorism is vanquished, arriving in this wonderful land will be much simpler, without the ride on the emotional roller-coaster, and we will just feel the wonderment and the comfort of being at home.

Jewish Life

To sleep, perchance to dream

Counting Sheep: The Science and Pleasures of Sleep and Dreams* by Paul Martin, St. Martin's Press, $36.95.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Shakespeare praised sleep because it "knits up the ravelled sleave of care." Someone remarked that the only people who sleep like a baby are those who don't have one. Robert Frost had "miles to go before I sleep" and Thomas Dekker viewed sleep as "a golden chain that ties health and our bodies together." A cynic would say, "Laugh and the whole world laughs with you, snore and you sleep alone."

The author of this wide-ranging, entertaining and informative volume is convinced that the subject of sleep deserves more attention in science, medicine, education, social policy and, most of all, in our everyday experiences. After all, it takes up about one-third of our lives. A good night's sleep gives you energy and helps you perform better at whatever you choose to do. It heightens the senses, sharpens the mind and mellows the spirit.

He is sure that road accidents, medical mistakes, political miscalculation, the space shuttle Challenger explosion, the disasters at Three Mile Island and Chernobyl are all ultimately attributed to poor sleep.

Is he correct? Possibly not. A recent large, longitudinal study that showed that although sleep deprivation and fatigue should be avoided, those who slept less than the sacred eight hours actually live longer.

There is little agreement among scientists about the significance, if any, of dreams, though one popular idea is that they may be concerned with the processing and consolidation of memory. Martin does not accept Freudian or Jungian theories about the symbolic nature of dreaming, but he does allow that some dreams, at least, may provide insights for the dreamer.

In the Hebrew scriptures, dreams occupy an important place in the lives of Jacob, Joseph, Daniel and others. The book of Proverbs says, "Sweet is the sleep of the working man," and the Talmud teaches that "every dream has a particle of prophecy in it." Maimonides devotes three chapters in his Guide for the Perplexed, to an analysis of the relationship between dreams and prophecy.

Martin's comprehensive survey deals with sleep disorders, the effects of alcohol, tobacco and food, snoring, yawning and the neurobiology of dreaming. What emerges from the data is a picture of sleep as a paradoxically active state.

As might be expected, the author provides some advice for insomniacs. Alas, not much of it is original. I certainly don't agree with the notion that reading before sleep should be avoided. On the contrary, a good book – if not too exciting, is a pathway to slumber; a bad book will get us there even quicker.

This popular, lively account of what is known and unknown about sleep and dreams is enhanced by interspersed literary examples and notable quotes from the famous.

The last word belongs to Shakespeare: "For some must watch and some must sleep, thus runs the world away."

Tips for surviving the fast

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Eat. Don't eat. Eat.

Preparing for – and surviving – the Yom Kippur fast sounds easy enough. But the 25-hour non-eating marathon can take a toll on your body. And the accompanying hunger and thirst can sidetrack you into concentrating on your stomach when you really should be focusing on your soul.

Today, tips from the experts as you prepare for, endure and complete the Yom Kippur fast:

• Taper off caffeine in the days preceding the fast. According to dietician Judy Baumann, "the nausea and headaches many people report while fasting have nothing to do either with food or fluid. They are usually the result of caffeine withdrawal." [http://tinyurl.com/468a8]

• Vary your meal schedule in the week before the fast. If you are extremely regular about your mealtimes, eating at different times tells your body not to expect to be fed at precisely 12:30 p.m. and 6 p.m. [www.jewfaq.org/fasttips.htm]

• Don't stuff yourself before the fast. Eat a normal meal that balances carbohydrates, fibre and protein. [http://tinyurl.com/46tpo]

• Make the meal tasty. The pre-fast meal doesn't have to be bland. Spices such as lemon or herbs are fine before fasting, but salt and monosodium glutamate should be reduced as much as possible. [http://segal.org/kippur/]

• And on Yom Kippur itself, don't hang around people who are talking endlessly about food and hunger.

The final meal before Yom Kippur is called seudat mafseket, "the final meal." According to the Talmud, eating the day before Yom Kippur is a mitzvah equal to the mitzvah of fasting on the day of Yom Kippur. [http:// tinyurl.com/6wqem] You can go with the tried-and-true chicken soup and potatoes or consider sautéed porcini chicken and arugula salad. [http://tinyurl.com/5lbzd]

As for the fasting itself, if you have a medical condition, always check with your doctor and rabbi before attempting to fast. The Jewish Diabetes Association website has important advice for diabetics about fasting, including how to prepare yourself psychologically for the holiday when you know that you will be eating while others are not. [www.jewishdiabetes.org/yomkippur-1.html]

Similarly, JewishPregnancy.org looks at the halachot of eating on the holiday. [http://tinyurl.com/3ng59] Several websites warn people with eating disorders about the dangers of fasting. "These women do not have to be put at risk," says Rabbi Dovid Goldwasser of Congregation Bais Yitzchak in Brooklyn, N.Y. "God's most important commandment to the Jewish people is to respect their bodies." [http://tinyurl.com/5sn57]

If you have trouble fasting for 25 hours, then be thankful you don't have to do it for 49 hours! During World War II, the Mir Yeshiva was able to escape Europe and relocate in Kobe, Japan. However, because of that country's proximity to the international date line, there was doubt about exactly when the fast should be observed while living in the Orient. So some members of the yeshiva took it upon themselves to fast for two days. [www.ohr.org.il/yhiy/article.php/1194]

Do you know someone who has trouble fasting? You can send some tips – and your best wishes – with a free e-mail greeting card. [www.flowgo.com/funpages/view.cfm/3165]

As for breaking the fast, on the Forward website, food maven Matthew Goodman surveys Yom Kippur break-fast traditions from the ubiquitous bagels with lox and cream cheese to a creamy egg-and-lemon soup known as avgolemono in Greece and sopa de huevo y limón in Turkey. Recipes are included. [http://tinyurl.com/4j2et]

One last piece of advice. Don't think of a day-long fast as a quick weight loss scheme. [http://tinyurl.com/6u9nx] As Richard Israel explains, "An average adult will burn 2,000 to 2,500 calories, about two-thirds of a pound, during a 24- hour fast. It doesn't take long at all to put that back on again. A couple of pieces of cheesecake and you will be just about even."

Have a tzom kal – an easy fast!

Kehillat Shaare Torah honours social activist

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Margaret Klompas, a longtime member of Kehillat Shaare Torah Congregation, is being honoured by congregants in early November for her years of social activism.

A guidance counsellor at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), Klompas, who emigrated from South Africa about 21 years ago, has been a member of the congregation for almost 19 years.

As well as being a former member of its board, she has organized adult education programs, initiated a women's Rosh Chodesh learning group, and provided weekly and Rosh Hashanah, Chanukah and Purim visits to Jewish residents at North York General Hospital's Seniors' Health Centre.

Klompas began visiting the seniors' home – it has about 40 Jewish residents – about 10 years ago because she wanted to do something to honour her father who had died in South Africa.

"My sons said Kaddish for him, and I wanted to do something as well. Ten years later, I am still visiting.

"I am learning so much from these people. They tell me about the early days in Toronto and about their lives and experiences."

She visits the same people every week, she says, but she always stops to chat with others along the way. "If I can make someone happy for a few seconds, why not?"

Klompas has gone to the funerals of some of the people she visited, and she once went to the centre at 2 a.m. to visit with a man whose mother had just died there.

"He had someone there when he needed it the most. We fulfilled a need."

For Rosh Hashanah, she has organized a group of people who walk to the centre after lunch to sing songs and blow the shofar, and on Chanukah they light a menorah.

"Blowing the shofar is a poignant experience. I have seen a wheelchair-bound woman stand up when she heard the shofar. It is powerful for these residents to have Jewish people visit them. This is a reward for me."

She says she is a "big believer" in serving the community for her own benefit. "I get tremendous personal satisfaction. I get more from giving than I actually give."

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, spiritual leader of Kehillat Shaare Torah, says the shul is honouring Klompas "because she is too humble to talk about what she does.

"She has a sincere interest in performing mitzvot that enrich people's lives, and in getting things done without fanfare.

"She has organized about 40 or 50 people to visit the centre on Rosh Hashanah, and invites dozens to her home for lunch so they can walk there together as a group."

He says Klompas has also put up people on Shabbat, sometimes for months at a time, so they can be close to the hospital to visit relatives.

"She also keeps her eye out for synagogue members who may appreciate an invitation to her home for dinner, or for a lunch out. These are the things we value. The synagogue is a place of mitzvah, Torah, learning and prayer, and Margaret has [embodied] all of that."

Synagogue members wanted Klompas' honour to be in the context of mitzvot, Rabbi Tradburks said, so leading up to a Nov. 6 tribute weekend, they will participate in activities in her honour, such as visiting seniors or hospital patients and collecting items for a food drive.

On the tribute weekend, there will be a Shabbat program and lecture, as well as a tribute dinner featuring North York General's chaplain and representatives from CHAT.

Zundel supporters' rally cut short

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – A local anti-racism group and a number of police cars made it difficult for a small but vocal group of pro-Ernst Zundel supporters to convey their message outside Justice Minister Irwin Cotler's Montreal office recently.

According to one television news report, the group, described as a handful of neo-Nazis and skinheads, assembled on Sept. 11 to send a message to the Canadian government telling it not to deport Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel.

Cotler was not in his Kent Avenue office at the time. But witnesses, including a member of Anti-Racist Action, a group that organized a counter demonstration at the scene, told The CJN the pro-Zundel supporters got more than they expected when they tried to start their rally.

Mike (not his real name) said he and about 60 other anti-racists arrived before the racist skinheads, and blocked the Zundel supporters at every turn, although there was no physical contact or violence.

"There was a lot of confusion because many of us were anti-racist skinheads and the police couldn't tell who was who," Mike said.

At at one point, about 20 police cars were at the scene and the Zundel supporters – who carried signs reading "Free Zundel" and other similar messages – were hustled away in the police cars. At writing, it was not known if they were arrested or driven to another location and let go.

Police officials at Station 25 on nearby Decarie Boulevard declined to release their report on the incident. Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, and B'nai Brith Quebec were not aware of the events when contacted by The CJN.

One eyewitness who did not wish to be identified said he heard one pro-Zundel rallier yell, "Kill the Jews." The police immediately put him into a car, the witness added.

Mike said he and his group learned about the pro-Zundel rally the day before it was to take place, when they saw an Internet announcement by Paul Fromm, who has been prominently associated with organized racist activities in Canada for several years. The website in question purports to be about free speech but is actually a cover site for the neo-Nazi Heritage Front.

"From that point on," Mike said, "we mobilized everyone we knew, [telling them] to be there."

Saulie Zajdel, the longtime city councillor for the area, which is heavily populated by Jews and other ethnic groups, said his 12-year-old daughter, Atara, saw the whole thing. Zajdel himself was on his way to his home in the same area and arrived just after the "rally" ended.

"These are people who actually don't care about freedom of speech," said Zajdel, the former Quebec director of B'nai Brith. "They use our freedom to pervert genuine values and are hatemongers, pure and simple."

For Mike, the presence of neo-Nazis trying to stage a rally is proof that authorities are failing to fight racism seriously through either lack of effort or lack of desire.

"Why aren't the police really monitoring Nazis?" he queried. "If you don't look for these people, you won't know they're there. We have more information on the neo-Nazis than the cops do."

Zundel, author of the book Did Six Million Really Die? and one of the best-known Holocaust deniers in the world, worked out of Toronto for years before moving to the United States in 2000.

In 2003, he was deported back to Canada and has spent the time since in a Toronto detention centre awaiting his fate, which could include being deported back to his native Germany, where he faces a prison term for his activities.

Coast to Coast

Thoughts on Syria, good news and 'Likudization'

Three items this week:

Recently, Syria's ruthless control of Lebanon and its sponsorship of terrorist groups was the subject of critical coverage in the Canadian media.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In late August, Syria coerced Lebanon's parliament into giving Gen. Emile Lahoud, the pro-Syrian president, an additional three years in power. In reaction, on Sept. 2 the United Nations Security Council, led by both the United States and France, passed Resolution 1559 calling for the withdrawal of foreign forces from Lebanon and for presidential elections without foreign interference.

The Toronto Star editorial, "Syria's bullying ways" (Sept. 6), was a no-holds-barred rebuke of Syria for its continuing oppression of Lebanon.

The Star wrote that "[w]hile Syria has been a genuine force for stability in Lebanon, where rival communities waged a savage war in the 1970s and 1980s, its continued meddling in Lebanese affairs, and denial of democracy, puts it on the wrong side of history."

There have been a number of UN Security Council resolutions concerning Syria's presence in Lebanon. In March 1978, UN Security Council Resolution 425 called for the "strict respect for the territorial integrity, sovereignty and political independence of Lebanon." In September 1982, Security Council Resolution 520 reiterated this position.

(Resolution 425 also called for Israel to withdraw from Lebanon, which it did. On June 16, 2000, the UN certified Israel's total compliance.)

So, UN Security Council Resolution 1559 simply restates the UN's longstanding policy on the territorial integrity and political independence of Lebanon.

The Star continued: "Syria has already been rightly criticized for giving sanctuary to Palestinian extremist groups, for letting Iranian-backed Hezbollah guerrillas run riot on the Israeli border and for spurning Israeli peace overtures over the Golan Heights."

The paper concluded that Syria's refusal to comply with the UN resolution to leave Lebanon, along with its sponsorship of terror, "can only further tarnish Syria's image, deepen its isolation, hurt its economy and invite sanctions."

The Globe and Mail also took up this theme. In its Sept. 6. editorial, "Syria's chutzpah," the paper wrote: "Hamas, the Islamist terrorist group that has claimed responsibility for the [recent Be'er Sheva] blasts, is headquartered in Syria. Khaled Mashaal, Hamas' supreme political leader, lives in Damascus under the protection of the Syrian regime. This makes Syria Hamas' sponsor." The Globe went on to warn that Syria would be held "accountable for its friends' repulsive acts."

Michael Coren's National Post article, "Israeli Arab team breaks new ground, (Sept. 4) was a rare and timely reminder of the many positive and newsworthy stories from Israel that never get told because they are constantly superseded by negative conflict-driven items that compete with them for coverage. The article's subtitle captures the story: "A first for tournament: Coach is Jewish, most of the players are Arab and fans are Palestinian." Coren's piece does not hide the significant problems faced by Israel's Arab citizens, but it is an important reminder that despite ongoing conflict, Israel remains a normal, fascinating country, imperfections and all.

Naomi Klein's Globe and Mail opinion piece, "The Likudization of the world," (Sept. 9) appeared just as this column went to press. A book could be written about the silliness of her central thesis, that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is the "spiritual/intellectual guru" to both U.S. President George W. Bush and Russian President Vladimir Putin – and what about British Prime Minister Tony Blair? – as if to suggest that the the world's most powerful leaders have no minds of their own in determining their countries' responses to terrorism. An avalanche of historical and other factual data rips this idea to shreds, but let that pass for now.

In a piece in the Nation magazine, titled "Bring Najaf to New York" (Sept. 13), Klein wrote about the anti-war movement in the United States in connection with the recent Republication convention. She railed against the "unintended barbarism of blind ignorance" of the various defences of U.S. policy in Iraq. Ironically, this very phrase can be applied to her own gross distortions of Arab-Israeli and U.S.-Israeli relations. As she herself said about a New York Times opionion piece that she strongly disagreed with: "I hardly know where to begin." Indeed.

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Peterborough shul back in business despite flood

Community pitches in to repair building; High Holy Day services held

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

This may be the time of year for solemn introspection, but for Larry Gillman, it's also a time for joy.

Gillman, president of Beth Israel Synagogue in Peterborough, can barely contain his gratitude when he relates to The CJN that more than $15,000 has been raised toward repairs and restoration of the shul following July's devastating floods in the city.

"The response has been phenomenal," says Gillman. "I can barely believe it."

And despite all odds, the 35-family-member synagogue is open for the High Holy Days, even though repairs to the building are far from over.

Peterborough's sole synagogue suffered an estimated $60,000 in damage following July's torrential storms, which dumped more than 200 millimetres of rain on the region.

Sewage and rainwater flooded the shul's lower level, which houses a kosher kitchen, a meeting hall and storage space containing documents and other property.

The water also damaged flooring, woodwork and drywall. Water-resistant carpeting that was installed for $25,000 after a flood two years ago had to be ripped up and thrown away because it was contaminated by raw sewage.

But widespread publicity about the synagogue's plight, including in The CJN, resulted in donations totalling about $15,000 from far-flung places.

"For some people, that's not a lot of money, but it's a heck of a lot for a community this size," Gillman said.

He said about 20 per cent came from Peterborough's Jewish community, with the rest arriving from individuals in Toronto and the Montreal suburb of Cote St. Luc, and from Mississauga's Solel Congregation, Beth Ezekiel Synagogue in Owen Sound and Temple Beth-El in Troy, N.Y.

What really has Gillman pleasantly surprised is the support the synagogue has received from Christian churches.

One donation came from St.Patrick's parish in Prince Edward Island and another from St. Paul the Apostle Church in Lakefield, north of Peterborough.

But reaction at the local New Son Life Harvest Church has Gillman stunned.

"They had heard that we couldn't finish the basement until the drywall was done. And it's impossible to get tradespeople to do drywall now. So the two reverends [at the church] took a chance and called their general contractor. He agreed, and he's donating all his time."

Some funds are also coming in from the local Unitarian community, which reached a historic agreement with the synagogue earlier this summer to share the synagogue.

And there's more: Just after the flood, synagogue officials announced that insurance would cover only $15,000 in damages, because coverage had been capped after a flood two years ago.

But it turns out the policy was misread, and insurance will pay $25,000.

Not including the free labour to fix the drywall, that leaves the congregation short about $20,000. "It's not the end of the world," Gillman said. "The gap will be manageable."

Recent weeks saw groups of 20 Jews and Unitarians working side by side to sanitize the kitchen.

"We'll be able to use the kitchen soon, and the plumbing now works," Gillman related.

"Our spirits have really been buoyed. When the chips were down, people both inside and outside the Jewish community responded in way that helps us ensure our survival. Bless them all."

Donations may still be sent to: Larry Gillman, c/o Beth Israel Synagogue, 777 Weller St., Peterborough, Ont. K9J 6Y5.

The Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman Fall 2004 Lecture Series at Holy Blossom Temple

Terror and the Defence of the West

Can the West maintain itself as a liberal and democratic society in the face of a new kind of war, one which may require changes to Western society? What is the place of Israel and the Jews in this war against terrorism — separate from the West or part of the defence of the West? What are the roles of Canada and America in this war on terror? How do we understand the new onslaught of Radical Islamic terrorism from a historical perspective? In this series of lectures, four of the important thinkers of our time will reflect on the new age of terrorism and the dilemmas posed for the liberal democratic West.

Jewish school enrollment on the rise in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG – Large scale immigration of young Jewish families from Argentina, Israel and the former Soviet Union has pushed projected enrollment at the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education's Gray Academy to its highest level in three years.

In the past two years, more than 600 new families have come here.

This year's BJE enrollment figure continues an upward trend over that same two-year period. Last fall enrollment stood at 590, reports BJE business manager Jack Cipilinsky.

By the end of June, the student body had grown to 628. Enrollment at the beginning of this school year is 652 with another 15 to 20 children expected by the end of October.

The positive enrollment trends over the past couple of years come after five years of decline. The Gray Academy opened at the new Asper Campus in South Winnipeg in 1997 with more than 800 students registered. Of particular concern over that five-year time span was the shrinking number of kindergarten students and the high percentage of students who were leaving after Grade 9 or 10 for regular public high schools, prestigious non-Jewish programs such as St. Johns-Ravenscourt school, Winnipeg's top private school, or the University of Winnipeg Collegiate.

Even those trends are reversed, Cipilinksy notes.

"For a while, we were only getting 30 to 40 children in kindergarten," he says. "Now we are getting 40 to 50 kids. That's very encouraging.

"And in our high school, the retention rate this year has been phenomenal. Over 90% of the students have returned."

The Gray Academy has also gained from Ravenscourt in another area.

Popular science teacher Sheppy Coodin, who has a PhD from the University of Western Ontario, has moved over to teach high school at the Gray Academy after several years teaching at Ravenscourt. Coodin is the creator of BioTrek, an award-winning Canada- wide series of summer science camps for high school students.

While the BJE is experiencing growth, Winnipeg's Hebrew-bilingual programs are showing a slight decline.

Brock Corydon elementary school (one of two public schools which offer half-day Hebrew programs) in South Winnipeg has a registration of 168, according to principal Laurie Tighe, down slightly from last year's figure of 175. There are 25 children in the kindergarten, about the same as last year.

Margaret Park elementary school, Brock Corydon's equivalent in North Winnipeg and the principal Jewish day school in the North End, has an enrollment of 77 students this year (as compared to 86 last year) with just six in kindergarten. This figure continues a decline that has been ongoing for the past nine years. Not only do the majority of young Jewish families live south now but almost all of the Argentinian families are also locating in South Winnipeg.

There are also two Orthodox day schools in the city. Ohr HaTorah, which has classes at the Herzlia Synagogue in south Winnipeg, is going into its seventh year with 22 preschoolers and 13 students spread over grades 1 through 7. The other Orthodox elementary school is a Chabad program located in North Winnipeg.

"Rabbi to the stars' speaks out in Ottawa

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA – If the kickoff event for the 2005 UJA appeal is an indication of how the campaign will fare, this should be a record year. More than 400 people crowded into the Soloway Jewish Community Centre to hear the world-renowned "rabbi to the stars," Rabbi Joseph Telushkin.

Rabbi Telushkin, the author of mystery novels, television scripts and books of practical advice for daily living, resides in New York but travels monthly to Los Angeles' Synagogue for the Performing Arts, where he has met, and influenced, many prominent performers.

He hobnobs with the rich and famous, but Rabbi Telushkin has the ability to speak to "the people." In his opening remarks, he thanked Mitchell Bellman, executive director of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa/Vaad Ha'ir, and Francie Greenspoon, director of the organization's communications, for their efforts in bringing him to Ottawa and securing media coverage of his appearance. That Rabbi Telushkin chose to open by praising and thanking others proved to be an example of the direction his words would take.

As the result of one of Rabbi Telushkin's best-known books, Words That Hurt, Words That Heal: The Ethics of Speech, the United States observed a "speak no evil day," an idea that is both simple and profound.

Many of the words of wisdom Rabbi Telushkin shared in Ottawa were ideas that we should all try to incorporate into our daily lives.

"It is not enough in life to have good intentions; you have to have a system," he said. "When you make something uppermost in your mind, suddenly opportunities present themselves."

The evening's moderator, Barbara Crook, deputy chair of the Women's Division for the 2005 UJA campaign, shared her personal epiphany after reading Rabbi Telushkin's The Nine Questions People Ask About Judaism (which, she noted, contained only eight questions when she first read it) during her journey toward becoming a "Jew by choice."

For the second year in a row, the campaign will be chaired by Robert Greenberg, a long-standing, dedicated community volunteer. The Women's Division is co-chaired by Susanne Sassoon and Anna-Lee Chiprout, who both participated in the community mission to Israel last year.

Labor MK lauds Winnipeg community

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — In a speech during a one-day stopover to help launch the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/Combined Jewish Appeal's 2004 campaign, Labor MK Rabbi Michael Melchior praised the Jewish community here for standing by the Jewish state during the latest round of Palestinian violence.

In his Sept. 7 remarks, Rabbi Melchior – Israel's deputy foreign minister and minister responsible for Israel-Diaspora relations under former prime minister Ehud Barak – praised the community for standing by Israel with frequent missions over the past four years while many other Jewish communities stayed away.

Rabbi Melchior helps kick off CJA campaign

"In the Torah, when God created the world, everything was good," he said. "The only thing that wasn't good was to be alone. In the early part of the intifadah, we in Israel were hurting and bleeding and felt that we were alone. People stopped coming to Israel in droves. Winnipeg was one of the few communities that kept coming and showed us that we were not alone."

Rabbi Melchior, currently chairman of the Birthright Israel program, said life in Israel is "difficult, tense and challenging. We have so many issues to deal with."

He said the biggest threat facing Israeli society is the widening divide between haredim and secular Jews.

He illustrated the divide by pointing to his own family. Citing the Barak government compromise deal that resulted in some haredim serving in the army, he noted that of his five sons, the oldest is in yeshiva and is opposed to military service, while the second son served in the army in Lebanon and is mad at his older brother for not doing army service, and the third son went on a hunger strike outside the Knesset because he was opposed to any exemption for haredim.

To draw secular Israelis back to religion, the Orthodox Rabbi Melchior has spearheaded the establishment of 180 community centres across the country over the past five years that make services and discussion available to secular Jews.

Rabbi Melchior also called for equal treatment for Israel's Arab citizens. He has been a major proponent of dialogue between Israeli Jews and Arabs.

As for the terror campaign being waged by the Palestinians against Israel, Rabbi Melchior is optimistic peace will eventually prevail. At the moment though, he says, "we still don't have a partner for peace. If [Palestinian Authority President Yasser] Arafat had even a little bit of [former South African president Nelson] Mandela in him, we would have peace already."

Touching on the growth of anti-Semitism in the world over the past few years, the rabbi noted that anti-Semitism poses a danger not just to Jews but to all democratic societies. "Hate and intolerance affect everyone," he said.

"To be a Jew is to be an optimist," he said. "Just because we can't see the light at the end of the tunnel doesn't mean it isn't there. It may be that the tunnel curves to the left or right."

Chair Larry Vickar said the goal for the 2004 CJA campaign is $4.5 million, up $200,000 from last year.

"Ours is one of the most successful campaigns in North America," Vickar said. "We support 12 beneficiary agencies in Winnipeg and also contribute to projects in Israel and impoverished Jewish communities in the former Soviet Union and Argentina."

Nightingale Health Care For Those You Love

When someone near and dear to you can no longer live independently, it's time to consider professional health care. This is a momentous decision; and anyone caring for your loved ones must be responsive to their needs and yours.

If you are facing such a decision, consider Nightingale Health Care. They will provide your loved one with compassionate, professional care that puts your mind at ease.

Jack Kerzner, the founder of Nightingale, has always believed in a few simple but fundamental principles. Your loved ones have the right to the best possible care, so they can enjoy life to the fullest extent their abilities allow. They should be informed about their choices and take part in decisions. Every client is a unique person, whose concerns should be listened to and respected at all times. Everyone has a right to his or her privacy. Moreover, clients should be informed of these rights.

Most importantly, Nightingale's caregivers are compassionate and understanding. They are highly skilled, competent, and conversant with the ongoing developments in the ever changing area of health care. That goal is accomplished by requiring that the Registered Nurses, Personal Support Workers, Homemakers and Rehabilitation Aides receive continuous in-house training and participate in professional development at higher learning institutions

One recent innovation was the development of care teams that include coordinators, nursing supervisors, personal support workers and registered nurses. Calls are always answered by friendly caring coordinators, 24 hours a day, never by voice mail.

Nightingale offers every aspect of short-and long-term personal care including rehabilitation, convalescent and palliative care, infant and childcare, and respite care to give primary caregivers a breather. They work hand in hand with rehabilitation consultants, insurance companies and legal firms and continue servicing many clients on behalf of local Community Care Access Centres.

Nightingale's extensive experience began with its founding in January 1986. Their long history of community involvement includes support staffing for community hospitals, long term care facilities and nursing homes. They began an ongoing involvement with the Toronto Homecare Program in 1989, which eventually evolved into their present relationship with local Community Care Access Centres.

Community care has undergone radical changes. Hospital stays are being shortened and convalescent time in one's own home has been growing in length. Nightingale has been quick to react with an innovative approach to homecare enabling them to service the ongoing complexities of home health care.

As a part time Rabbi and with ongoing involvement in adult education, Kerzner maintains his connection to the Jewish community. In-services devoted to the kosher kitchen and Jewish observances reflect a commitment to serve the Jewish community with cultural sensitivity.

Consistency of care is of utmost importance. Staff retention is very high. Some caregivers have been with Nightingale for over a decade. Caregivers eventually are treated as part of the family even joining their clients on vacations and attending family simchas.

While Nightingale has always striven to maintain the highest quality, their standards have risen over the years and have gained recognition by the Canadian Council of Health Services Accreditation.

Nightingale Health Care is located at 5001 Yonge St., Suite 1302 in North York. Visit their website at www.nightingalehealthcare.ca; and call them at (416) 222-6567 for a free in-home assessment.

Yeast Kuchen brings back childhood memories

By LISA J. SOLOMON
Special to The CJN

The 3x5 file cards are yellowed with age, carefully covered in saran wrap and scotch taped in the back. At the top right hand corner of one is the name Judy H. Then on the next line, is Chocolate Yeast Kuchen, followed by the not overly detailed recipe, written in small black-ink letters explaining how to make one of my favourite desserts.

"You kids loved that cake," my mother said, as we began to take out the flour, sugar and eggs to make it together in my Los Angeles kitchen. These were her recipe cards, from her Atlanta recipe file, attached to a shelf right above her busy kitchen counter. She kept them wrapped because with six kids, spills were everywhere.

As we melted the butter in the milk, separated the eggs and waited for the yeast to proof, she said she got this recipe from Judy Herzenstein when we lived in Cleveland.

"I ate it at her house maybe 40 years ago, probably on yontif when our families celebrated together."

Judy is no longer living, and our family long ago left the Midwest for the South. But instantly, I was transported to our old brick house on Fenwick Road, where huge oak trees arched over the street where we played, tadpoles darted back and forth in our small backyard pond and on the holidays, beautiful French doors with crystal handles opened to the dining room filled with warm foods, my five brothers and sisters, my laughing dad, and my smiling, fast-moving mom.

As I watched my mother preparing the light, creamy dough, patting it out evenly, gently, with her hands, then spreading one rectangle, then another with the whipped egg whites, followed by a generous sprinkling of chocolates, raisins and nuts, I wondered how she found time to make a multi-staged desert.

"Oh, I only made it for Friday night or yontif because it takes so much time," she said as she moved from rolling the dough to carefully lifting then lowering it into the bundt pan. I still found this amazing, because she prepared this truly wonderful, sophisticated cake along with a full Shabbat or holiday meal while she managed the constant care and feeding of a household of eight.

She is right. Every one of us loved the Chocolate Yeast Kuchen. But more now, I love her for giving me these special memories, unique tastes and old recipe cards coloured with meaning.

CHOCOLATE YEAST KUCHEN

This cake has a few steps, but the special taste and texture are well worth the effort. If you make it once, it will become a holiday favourite from then on.

Yeast Kuchen brings back memories

In microwave-safe measuring glass, pour milk and add butter sticks. Microwave until butter is completely melted (approximately 2 minutes depending on temperature of butter). Separate eggs and refrigerate the whites for filling later. Pour the yeast into the warm water and let it proof until bubbly and completely dissolved (approximately 2-3 minutes). Add yolk to yeast mixture.

In bowl of electric mixer with paddle attachment, sift flour and sugar together. Make a well in the flour and pour egg mixture into centre. Turn mixer on low and slowly add butter mixture. Increase mixer speed only slightly and continue to mix, scraping sides of bowl if necessary, until batter is completely blended and creamy dough begins to pull away from the sides.

Pull dough into a large ball with your hands and place in large glass bowl. Sprinkle the top with flour (approximately 1/2 tsp.) and cover with paper towel. Refrigerate at least three hours or overnight. It will rise to at least double its size and then fall a little.

Bring dough to room temperature. Punch down and knead slightly in your hands until dough is evenly textured and hardened top from refrigeration is softened and mixed in.

Divide dough in half and place on sheets of wax paper. Pat into two large rectangles, about 10x12 inches, large enough to be rolled and meet in the centre of a 10-inch (12-cup) Bundt pan.

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 10-inch bundt pan. In large bowl of electric mixer with whip attachment, beat egg whites on medium until white and foamy. Slowly pour in sugar, a few tablespoons at a time, keeping mixer on medium, until soft white peaks form when beater is lifted away. Do not overmix.

Spread egg white evenly on each rectangle, leaving a half-inch on sides uncovered. In small glass bowl, combine nuts, chocolate morsels, raisins, cinnamon and sugar and mix with hands. Sprinkle evenly on each half covering egg whites. (Cinnamon and sugar that slips to bottom of bowl should be sprinkled over as well.)

Roll dough from narrower side, over filling, like a thick spiral, lifting from opposite side for very last roll. Some of the filling may ooze out, but that is fine. Using wax paper to help lift, carefully place each roll into bundt pan, open end on the bottom and slowly release roll from paper. Pinch open sides of each roll onto the other side. Again, some filling may be outside dough, but that is fine.

Bake 45-55 minutes, until dough rises and is golden brown.

Let cool on metal rack 15-20 minutes and then, using small knife, loosen cake from sides. (Egg white is especially sticky, so make sure those areas are released from sides.) Using oven mitts, turn cake over onto serving platter and let cool completely.

Dust with powdered sugar, if desired, and serve.

Quick cake recipes to break the fast

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

For breaking the fast in our home, we always have a dairy meal. The main course is usually a blintz soufflé or quiche of some kind and the tuna and egg salad are usually right next to the lox and bagels and cut up fruit and vegetables. What changes from year to year are the desserts.

I tend to make a lot of cakes for breaking the fast, as they can be cut to serve almost any number of people.

The following cake recipes are all so simple that they can be thrown together in under 15 minutes and left to bake while you do other things.

BLUEBERRY BUNDT CAKE

1 1/2 cups fresh blueberries
2 tbsp. flour
1 package lemon cake mix
1 cup sour cream
4 eggs
powdered sugar, optional
more fresh berries, optional

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a bundt pan and set it aside. Drain the blueberries well, place them in a bowl and sprinkle the flour over the well-drained berries.

In the bowl of an electric mixer combine the dry cake mix and sour cream. Start to beat them together and then add the eggs, one at a time, while beating at slow speed. Beat at medium speed, scraping bowl often. When the batter is combined fold in floured blueberries by hand. Pour the batter into the prepared cake pan. Bake 35-40 minutes. Cool in pan 15 minutes before removing the cake. Serves 10 to 12. You can decorate the cake with powdered sugar or fresh berries.

SWEET CHOCOLATE BUNDT CAKE

1 package yellow cake mix
1 package instant vanilla pudding and pie filling
8 oz. sour cream
3 eggs
1/2 cup vegetable oil
1/2 cup water
4 oz. sweet chocolate, grated
6 oz. semisweet chocolate chips
1/2 cup chopped pecans
1/2 cup ready made chocolate frosting, melted
pecan halves

Preheat oven to 350. Grease and flour a 10-in. fluted tube-bundt pan and set it aside. In the mixing bowl of an electric mixer, combine the cake and pudding mixes, sour cream, eggs, oil and water. Beat on low speed for 2 minutes. Fold in the grated chocolate, chocolate chips and pecans. Transfer to the greased and floured pan. Bake for 60-65 minutes or until a toothpick inserted near the centre comes out clean. Cool for 10 minutes before removing from pan to a wire rack. Drizzle with frosting. Garnish with pecan halves.

Madonna calls for world peace, visits sage's tomb

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — After midnight prayers at the grave of a rabbinical sage, songstress Madonna on Monday called for world peace at a conference on Kabbalah, Jewish mysticism, a highlight of her five-day visit to Israel.

Israel hopes the star – the biggest pop celebrity to visit in years – will revive tourism battered by four years of violence, and government officials were on hand at the David International Hotel in Tel Aviv to share the spotlight, the glory and the photographs.

Madonna, wearing a low-cut dress with a black and white leopard pattern, told fellow conference-goers that she was hesitant to come to Israel "after seeing so many news reports about terror attacks" and reading State Department travel warnings.

But the biggest danger she had faced was "a few very naughty paparazzi waiting outside my hotel," she said, laughing

"I realize now that it is no more dangerous to be here than it is to be in New York, and I would like to emphasize the fact that I feel very safe and very welcome," Madonna said.

Madonna arrived in Israel last week to take part in the 2,000-person conference coinciding with Rosh Hashanah, the Jewish new year. Her five-day visit was marred on Friday when two of her bodyguards got into a brawl with waiting photographers at her Tel Aviv hotel.

The Catholic-born singer last visited Israel more than a decade ago.

"I promise not to stay away for another 10 years," she said to applause.

Speaking without notes, Madonna said the people she met during her trip "have one thing in common – we want to create peace in the world.

"We want to put an end to chaos and suffering," she said, "but most of all we want to put an end to hatred with no reason."

Madonna, who recently adopted the Hebrew name Esther and wears a trademark Kabbalah red string on her wrist, has said she is serious about her belief in Jewish mysticism and is irritated by accusations her faith is nothing more than a celebrity fad.

> The study of Kabbalah has become popular among celebrities

The singer said she was not representing a religion. Rather, she said, "I'm here as a student of Kabbalah. A kabbalist sees the world as a unified whole. A kabbalist asks why."

Early Sunday, Madonna and her husband, Guy Ritchie, went to the Kiryat Shaul cemetery outside Tel Aviv to visit the grave of the kabbalist sage Rabbi Yehuda Ashlag. Polish-born Rabbi Ashlag is the renowned author of the Ha-Sulam (The Ladder), a commentary on the core kabbalistic text, the Zohar. He died in 1954.

Madonna, wearing jeans, a black and gray checkered sweater with a matching cap and a large diamond-encrusted "E" on a chain, spent more than an hour inside the stone mausoleum, placing candles on the tomb, praying and chanting.

Led by a rabbi, Madonna and her small entourage recited blessings over food and wine, drank from small plastic cups and circled the raised stone grave. Toward the end of the ceremony, Madonna wiped tears from her eyes.

She was unable to approach the Western Wall, part of Judaism's holiest site, due to throngs of photographers.

The study of Kabbalah has become increasingly popular among celebrities, including pop singer Britney Spears and Hollywood actress Demi Moore, who along with Madonna, sport red strings on their wrists. When tied with seven knots to the left wrist, the red thread, or bendel in Yiddish, is supposed to ward off the evil eye and assorted negative forces.

In Judaism, Kabbalah means literally "what has been handed down" – writings dating to the Middle Ages and oral teachings that are held by the faithful to describe the true nature of God and man and reveal the secrets of Creation.

Doctors bring children to Israel for heart surgery

The organization – now the largest project in the world providing urgently needed, pediatric cardiac surgery and follow-up care for children from Third World and developing countries free of charge – was founded in 1995, by American-born, Israeli pediatric cardiac surgeon Ami Cohen.

Here we were in Zanzibar, a tiny Muslim island in the tropics off the coast of Tanzania, working in a hospital with virtually no suitable equipment and a poorly trained and overworked medical staff. All they had was a portable echo machine – manufactured in Israel – and their hands to treat many potential pediatric cardiac surgical cases.

And now they had the Israelis.

Lines of hopeful families extended out the door, through the hallway, into the pediatric ward, down the stairs and out into the main hospital courtyard.

They were all responding to an announcement on Zanzibari radio earlier in the week, inviting parents to bring children suffering from heart problems to be examined by two heart specialists from Israel.

Occasionally, Katz and Sasson peered out of the examination room to check on how many patients remained to be seen. This was going to be a long week – the Israeli heart doctors had committed themselves to examining every single child who showed up at the hospital.

The long lines were nothing new for these doctors. In fact, the duo – as well as other Save a Child's Heart staff – has become accustomed to such crowds after travelling around the world in search of candidates for cost-free heart procedures at the Wolfson Medical Center in Holon, south of Tel Aviv.

Since its inception, the group's staff has operated on nearly 1,000 children ranging in age from infants to teenagers. Patients, who are selected without regard to race or religion, have come from countries around the world, including China, Ethiopia, Moldova, Ghana, Jordan, Nigeria and Tanzania.

Nearly 40 per cent of Save a Child's Heart's pediatric cases come from the Palestinian Authority.

In addition to the cardiac care and surgeries in Israel, the group has an outreach training program for medical personnel from participating countries.

Doctors and nurses are brought to Israel for in-depth training, and the organization's staff travel overseas to educate and perform surgeries in co-operation with local personnel. The group's ultimate goal is to make partner countries self-sufficient in performing cardiac surgeries on their children.

On this particular mission to Zanzibar, Katz and Sasson were also examining children on whom they had operated in the past to see how they had progressed since their surgeries.

Still, the primary purpose of this trip to east Africa was to select new cases to bring back to Israel for operations.

I was especially excited to see the post-operative children: I had observed, firsthand, the open heart surgeries of several of these Zanzibari children one year before in Israel.

When I said goodbye to those kids in Holon more than 12 months ago, never in my wildest dreams did I think that I would see them again on their native island – and certainly not good as new.

It was easy to identify the post-op children: When the doctor finished examining them, these little kids would say, "todah rabah" and "l'hitraot" – thank you very much and goodbye, in Hebrew – the words they had learned during their stays in the Israeli hospital.

More apparent, however, were the physical changes. I recognized the faces of children who had arrived in Israel as skin and bones, on the verge of death due to complications from their heart problems. But since their surgeries, many of these children had gained 20 to 30 pounds and generally looked more energetic.

As an aspiring physician, it was fascinating for me to observe Katz and Sasson at work. They graciously explained to me how to read the echo machine and how properly to listen to the patient's heart and lungs to pinpoint the exact nature of a heart problem.

It was incredible to witness how these experts, after just a few seconds of listening to the heart, before even looking at the echo, were able to diagnose a particular kind of heart murmur, a broken valve, a battered-up septum, a missing ventricle or a malfunctioning artery.

Yet there were some agonizing moments during those few days.

A 17-year-old girl, who had been diagnosed with Esptein's heart syndrome, a fatal heart disease that is uncorrectable, had developed terrible secondary complications from her heart problems that were clearly affecting her day-to-day living. She was unable to move on her own and had extreme difficulty breathing. Katz and Sasson told me that it was a miracle that she had lived this long, but she only had a few months left.

When they sat with the family and explained that the prognosis was not good and their team would be unable to help, I was in tears. As with so many other children these doctors have come across in the developing countries, she could have perhaps been spared with early detection and intervention if she had access to regular health care. But since the girl's disease had not been treated, the situation was beyond repair.

Yet perhaps the most amazing aspect of my experience volunteering in Zanzibar with the Save a Child's Heart endeavour was watching how, when Katz and Sasson examined a child, they were indifferent to what the kid or his mother was wearing, whether the child's name was Abdullah Muhammed or Abrahim Rantissi Jr.

All they saw, on an echo machine, was a ticking heart that desperately needed fixing.

Palestinian groups in Gaza collecting arms ahead of withdrawal

Some of the organizations have direct or indirect control of these tunnels, and a great deal of effort is being made to obtain various types of weapons and ammunition.

Many groups are willing to pay the high prices required by those who smuggle the arms into Gaza. The price of arms has recently increased greatly, since the Egyptians took measures to thwart the smugglers. Israel has expressed satisfaction at these steps, but has stressed that in themselves, they are not enough, and Israel has called for an even more vigorous policy.

Defence sources say intelligence clearly shows that arms smuggling by Palestinians into Gaza, primarily via the Sinai peninsula and under the Philadelphi route is at an all-time high. In the 18 months from January 2003 to July 2004, some 4,900 Kalashnikov assault rifles, 330 anti-tank devices, 33 shells of various calibre and five machine-guns have been smuggled into the Gaza Strip. In addition, two tons of explosives and an estimated 380,000 bullets have been illicitly brought into the area.

It is clear that smuggling still goes on, despite the fact that Egypt is making a serious effort to prevent the Palestinians from smuggling strategic weapons, such as military-grade Katyushas with a range of 20 kilometres, or portable missiles capable of shooting down Israeli helicopters.

If the Palestinians were to get such weapons, the entire situation in the Gaza Strip and surrounding area could deteriorate in one fell swoop and force Israel to use massive force, which would inevitably lead to civilian casualties.

In meetings between Egyptian and Israeli officials, the Israelis explained the dangers of such a deterioration. The first meeting of the two security delegations was held in Israel. The second will be held in Egypt at the end of this month.

By then the Egyptians hope to have completed their meetings with the Palestinian factions, including Hamas and Islamic Jihad, while Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat is still considered the main interlocutor for the PA.

Even though Egypt's demands include dates by which Arafat is supposed to complete his part in the preparations for an Israeli withdrawal from Gaza – dates that have been given in three Egyptian requests to Arafat, the last on Sept. 1 – Cairo does not define these dates as deadlines.

Clashes in the West Back

Nine Palestinian terrorists were killed by Israel Defence Forces troops in separate incidents in Nablus and Jenin last week. An 11-year-old girl also died in the operations.

'Israel should negotiate'

Israel should open negotiations with Palestinians on the creation of a Palestinian state, the leaders of Syria and Egypt said after a meeting in Damascus last week. Syrian President Bashar al-Assad and Egypt's Hosni Mubarak said Israel should "start negotiations for the establishment of the independent Palestinian state," according to reports from the official news agencies of the two Arab states. Assad and Mubarak also said Palestinian factions should work "to achieve their commitments toward the establishment of an independent state.'

'Disengagement' starts

Israel approved compensation for settlers to be evacuated under Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's disengagement plan. The Security Cabinet last week voted 9-1 to approve a range of proposals governing evacuation and compensation of settlers under the disengagement initiative. The relocation packages for families from Gaza and four West Bank settlements who move voluntarily before the 2005 deadline for withdrawal from the territories could total as much as $500,000. Payouts could begin imminently.

Bike bomber wounds 3

A Palestinian suicide bomber on a bicycle wounded three Israeli soldiers last week at the Habla checkpoint near Kalkilya. Palestinian farmers use the checkpoint to reach their land. The Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, the terror wing of PA President Yasser Arafat's Fatah faction, claimed responsibility.

Palestinian refugee report

Palestinians are the largest refugee group in the world, according to a UN report. The more than 5 million Palestinian refugees make up 18 per cent of all refugees, according to the report released last week by the UN Habitat Globalization and Urban Culture agency. Thirty-six per cent of these refugees are less than 16 years old. Palestinian refugees are spread throughout the West Bank and Gaza, as well as in several Arab countries.

Population growth slows

On the eve of Rosh Hashanah, Israel's population was estimated at 6.8 million, consisting of 5.5 million (81 per cent) Jews and 1.3 million Arabs. The decline in the population growth rate continued in 2003, with the population growing by 1.8 per cent – up some 117,000 – compared with a 1.9 per cent growth in 2002 (when the population grew by 122,000). These figures are a result of a decline in immigration. The Jewish sector grew in 2003 by 1.4 per cent, while the Arab population increased by 3 per cent. The Arab-Muslim population increased by 3.3 per cent, while the Christian community increased by only 1.2 per cent.

Gaza terrorists killed

An Israel Defence Forces helicopter fired a missile at a car in Gaza City Sunday night, killing top Hamas terrorist Khaled Abu Shamiyeh. The IDF also killed a Palestinian as he planted a mine near the Karni junction in Gaza.

No probe of 'curse' rabbi

Attorney General Menachem Mazuz and state prosecutor Eran Shendar decided Monday not to launch an investigation of Rabbi Yosef Dayan. Rabbi Dayan, from the West Bank town of Psagot, last week declared his readiness to carry out a kabbalistic Pulsa Denura ceremony to place a curse on Prime Minister Ariel Sharon for his Gaza withdrawal plan. The rabbi held a similar ceremony before the 1995 assassination of prime minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Rosh Hashanah and Continuity...

This time of year in the Jewish calendar is all about beginnings and recommitments. Thankfully, once again, we are given the opportunity to begin anew and to recommit to the people, the values and the way of life that are most precious to us. If staying connected to the Jewish community in Canada and abroad is part of that new beginning for you , there is no better vehicle for doing so than The Canadian Jewish News.

As a way of helping individuals launch their new beginnings, The CJN is introducing a special continuity subscription offer in time for Rosh Hashanah. We have decided to offer our readers a special, one-time opportunity to provide their children or their grandchildren with their own subscription to The CJN.

A gift subscription for your child or grandchild, who does not already subscribe to The CJN, will cost $19.95 (taxes included) for one full year to anywhere in Canada.

Could there be a better gift at Rosh Hashanah for your child or grandchild than the opportunity to feel part of the Jewish community?

Organization launched for Hebrew speakers in Canada

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG – Rami Kleinmann, prairie regional director of the Jewish National Fund, has taken the lead in creating a new organization for ex-patriate Israelis and other Hebrew speakers living in Canada.

The group, yet unnamed and under the auspices of the Jewish National Fund (JNF), aims to open new channels of communication to second-, third- and fourth-generation Canadians of Israeli background and try to reconnect them with their ancestral homeland, says Kleinmann.

Arie Lavy, an Israeli-born computer expert who has been living in Winnipeg for more than 25 years, agrees that an effort such as this is long overdue.

"This is the first time that anyone or any organization has recognized the need to reach out to Israelis and ex-Israelis living here," he says. "No one has done anything for this group before.

"When we sat down to try to figure out how many Israelis there are in Winnipeg, we thought there were maybe 80 to 100 of us. We came up with a list of over 650 names of Israelis or other Hebrew speakers here."

Under auspices of JNF

Kleinmann and the JNF recently launched the new organization in Winnipeg with an Israeli-style talk show at the Asper Jewish Community Campus' Berney Theatre. The show was hosted by Israeli television talk-show host Eitan Dancig and featured guests Aviv Bushinsky, the chief of staff to Benjamin Netanyahu, Israel's finance minister; Yaacov Brosh, Israel's consul-general for Ontario and Western Canada; Canadian El Al spokesperson Stanley Morais; and Nathan Jacobson, a former Winnipegger with business interests in Israel, Russia and Ukraine, who is now living in Toronto. The program was conducted entirely in Hebrew.

"This is the first time that the live Israeli talk-show format has been used outside of Israel," Kleinmann says. "In Israel, talk shows are very popular but Israelis living in Canada don't have access to them."

Kobi Hasid, a Winnipeg scooter and used-car dealer who came here from Ashkelon 14 years ago, was in the audience along with his wife, Orly.

"It was nice being able to get together as a community of Hebrew speakers," he says. "I hope there will be more programs like this."

Lavy adds that it was a great evening. "It felt almost like being in Israel," he says.

Kleinmann, the JNF and the talk- show participants duplicated the Winnipeg program in Toronto, Edmonton, Calgary and Vancouver. Overall, more than 1,000 people participated in the program in the five cities.

"We had a tremendous number of people who wanted to be involved and subsequently asked what they can do to help Israel," Kleinmann says.

He reports that a committee of 18 ex-Israelis living in Winnipeg have come together to plan future programming, including Chanukah and Purim programs.

He adds that the new organization also provides an outlet for conversational Hebrew in Canada. While many Jewish Canadians learn and have learned Hebrew in day-school programs, they don't have any place to practice Hebrew outside the classroom.

THE BLAST OF HORNS: The Grade 6 students at United Synagogue Day Schools' Bathurst campus recently participated in a shofar-making workshop with Rabbi Nechemia Deitch. In the workshop, each student made his or her own shofar and had the opportunity to practise the different types of shofar sounds they would hear at their Rosh Hashanah services: tekiah, shvarim, truah and tekiah gedolah. Seen are Grade 6 students with Rabbi Deitsch and teacher Sefi Chassid.

Rosenstrasse recounts unique event in Nazi Germany

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Margarethe von Trotta's dark and engaging film, Rosenstrasse, recounts a unique incident in Nazi Germany.

The 136-minute movie, in German with English sub-titles, opens in Toronto on Sept. 24.

In February 1943, the SS and Gestapo rounded up thousands of Jewish men in Berlin and interned them in a variety of locales.

Many were married to Christian women, so-called Aryans, who refused to accept their fate.

As news of their imprisonment spread, their wives and family members congregated in front of a Jewish community building on Rosenstrasse to protest their detention and probable deportation to death camps.

The SS and police repeatedly dispersed the demonstrations with drawn weapons, but to no avail. The women wanted their husbands back.

Under mounting pressure, the Nazis capitulated. Shortly afterward, Berlin suffered its first heavy British bombing raid.

Writing in his diary, Propaganda Minister Joseph Goebbels observed: "Some unpleasant scenes have unfortunately taken place in front of a Jewish old people's home, where the population gathered in a large crowd and to a certain extent took sides with the Jews. I have ordered (the police) not to continue with the evacuation of the Jews at such a critical time. We would prefer to wait a few weeks more until a time when it will be possible to carry out the operation more thoroughly."

As it happened, the Nazis never again attempted to separate these Jewish men from their wives. They had won an unprecedented victory.

In Rosenstrasse, von Trotta mixes fact with fiction in a film that summons up these momentous events.

Through fictional characters, she deftly draws an inspirational portrait of unbounded love, loyalty and courage.

As the film opens, in New York City, Ruth Weinstein (Jutta Lampe) is in mourning, her beloved husband having just died. During the war, Ruth, a half-Jew, was interned in the building on Rosenstrasse.

Lena Fischer (Katya Riemann), a German aristocrat whose husband, Fabian (Martin Feifel), was Jewish, saved Ruth from certain death.

Ruth's inquisitive daughter, Hannah (Maria Schrader), wants to understand her mother's wartime ordeal. She travels to Germany and persuades Lena, now an old women, to tell her story.

German women plea for their husbands' release in the film Rosenstrasse.

From that point onward, the film unfolds in a series of vivid flashbacks.

These scenes encompass the drama of Rosenstrasse and Lena's romance with her husband-to-be in the face of her father's unrelenting anti-Semitism.

Rosenstrasse is burdened by an overdrawn scene in which Lena must perform a sexual favour for Goebbels in order to gain the release of Fabian.

But on balance, Rosenstrasse soars and tells one of the most interesting stories of civil disobedience in the annals of Nazi Germany.

Walk on Water tracks war criminal

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Two interlocking themes – the legacy of the Holocaust and the presence of Nazi war criminals in modern German society – merge in Walk on Water, directed by Eyan Fox.

These issues, the staple of numerous Israeli films, may seem somewhat predictable to some. But in Fox's hands, they are fresh and sometimes even compelling.

The chief protagonist, Eyal, is a tough Mossad agent hot on the trail of a Nazi war criminal whose whereabouts are yet to be determined.

Eyal (Lior Ashkenazi) is not particularly enamoured of the assignment. Like many Israelis he believes the issue is irrelevant in this new era of Palestinian suicide bombings. But his boss insists and Eyal reluctantly complies.

Walk on Water, which was screened at the Toronto International Film Festival, opens in Istanbul as Eyal takes what seems like a leisurely cruise on the Bosporus.

In fact, he is not on a vacation. Having spotted his latest quarry, an Arab man in the company of his wife and child, Eyal retires to the bathroom and tests a syringe. When the passengers disembark, Eyal brushes past the man and stabs him with the needle. He falls to the ground like a sack of potatoes and his wife lets out a shriek.

In this brief introductory scene, Fox establishes Eyal's credentials as a cool, unruffled Mossad assassin of Arab terrorists.

Later, as he sits in his boss' office, Eyal is given a completely different task, and he does not relish it. Perhaps his lack of enthusiasm is connected to a sudden death in his family.

Eyal's target is Alfred Himmelman, a German who committed war crimes. Himmelman has gone into hiding, but his grandchildren, Axel and Pia, who are in their mid-20s, may be helpful in tracking him down.

Conveniently enough, Pia (Carolina Peters) is a volunteer on a kibbutz, and her brother (Knut Berger) is due to visit Israel shortly.

Pretending to be a tour guide, Eyal picks up Axel at the airport and drives him to Pia's kibbutz near the Dead Sea. In the next few days, Eyal shows Axel the beauty of Israel's countryside.

Eyal does not think highly of Axel, curtly dismissing him as "a fake liberal." His sneering attitude, probably a function of Axel's benevolent interest in the Palestinian inhabitants of the territories, may also have something to do with his homosexuality.

Eyal has a greater rapport with Pia, a pert blonde with an appealing personality. She resents her wealthy parents because they hid her grandfather, the war criminal, after the war.

As Walk on Water shifts course, Eyal pursues Himmelman on German soil. Now Eyal must come to terms with his negative feelings about that country, passed on to him by his mother, a former German Jew from Berlin.

Walk on Water, written by Fox's collaborator, Gal Uchovsky, and drawing on competent performances from its lead actors, is an intriguing film. But curiously, it lacks the white-hot tension of the finest thrillers, and its ending is just a little too pat.

Singer resumes opera career 30 years later

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Renee (Rosen) Barda was on the brink of a promising career in opera 30 years ago after years of study as a pianist and a singer in Canada and in England, but gave up an opportunity to audition with the Royal Opera House in Covent Garden when she married Dino Barda, a member of an aristocratic Italian family.

When Barda's husband died four years ago, her sons pressured her to go back to her music, and last year, she made a CD, Posterity: Timeless World Music. Since then, the versatile mezzo-soprano has once again found herself in the limelight and she says she is enjoying her return to her music.

Barda, who sings in English, French, Spanish, Italian, Hebrew and Yiddish, was featured recently on Global TV on the program, Second Chance: Making It Work. The biographical show, interspersed with her singing, will be repeated several times this fall.

Born and raised in Toronto, Barda says she began taking formal piano lessons at the age of six "and I was always singing." As a child, she first performed at her uncle's wedding, "and I was asked to sing at all family functions. I developed my love of music when I was very young."

She was accepted into the faculty of music at the University of Toronto and after graduation, received the Eaton Award and other awards. She made her debut performance at Stratford in the title role of Rossini's opera Cenerentola (Cinderella) and appeared in many operatic concerts.

Barda received a Canada Council Grant to study in Europe, and in London in the mid-1970s, she met Dino Barda whose father had been knighted by the Italian king before World War 11.

"I was at Hillel House and I heard Dino, who was visiting, speaking Italian. Since I spoke Italian, we were introduced. That's when I was to have a final audition with the Covent Garden Opera."

When they became serious about marrying, Dino's father did not want her to pursue an operatic career, she says.

"Although I was passionate about my career and realized that I was giving up a great opportunity, I made the monumental decision to marry and give up my career.

"We came to Toronto, settled in North York, and I never regretted my decision."

She became a suburban housewife and mother in a patriarchal household. After the birth of her three boys, Ilan, Yaniv and Alon, she returned to music, giving piano lessons and later taking on voice students.

Mezzo-soprano Renee Barda

"Although I didn't sing professionally throughout those years, I always sang in the house, even when I called my boys."

She says her husband was not a healthy man and suffered from several illnesses. "After his death, I realized that I had to take charge of my life as Dino made most of the decisions. My boys convinced me it was now time for me to make my own decisions."

She had a tea party for a group of her friends and performed some operatic pieces for them. She then began going to retirement residences to perform and, as the word spread, she received requests from other retirement homes and organizations.

Last year, her sons convinced her to record the CD, which she dedicated to the memory of her husband.

During the two-hour recording session, the controllers working on the CD were amazed at the gigantic voice from such a small person.

The CD has 12 selections, half from the world of opera and the other half from Broadway and popular music.

"I confess that as I completed this recording, it was as if many years of something locked up inside me suddenly had the opportunity to be released. I do believe that there is a certain time in life where everything comes together in a certain way, and I believe, for me, this is the time.

"I am of the opinion that a beautiful voice is a very special gift from God, [and] in truth, it should be heard. My greatest pleasure is to perform."

Along with her musical concerts, Barda also presents educational programs related to the composers in her repertoire.

On Oct. 17, Barda, whose website is www.reneebarda.com, will present a concert at Baycrest's Apotex Centre from 1:30 to 2:30 pm. She will also be at a number of retirement residences and give a recital at the McMichael Gallery in Kleinberg.

Italian director tackles the Arab-Israeli conflict

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Knowing that the Arab-Israeli conflict has been the subject of countless movies, Italian film director Saverio Costanzo realized he would need a fresh approach to leave an impression.

Instead of dwelling on hopelessly divisive politics, he conjured up a script that would focus on its tragic human dimensions.

"I didn't want to make a political film," explained Costanzo, who turns 29 later this week. "I was touched by the human situation."

He stumbled upon his angle by pure chance, talking to a pacifist-minded Palestinian educator, a school headmaster, whose spacious home was commandeered by the Israeli army as an observation post in the early 1990s.

The result is Private, a 90-minute feature starring the Israeli Arab actor Mohammed Bakri that was first shown at the Cinematheque in Tel Aviv.

Recently screened at the Toronto International Film Festival, Private will open at the Haifa Film Festival at the end of this month and in Italy next January in a theatrical release.

As of last week, Private had yet to be bought by Canadian or American distributors.

The film, which Costanzo describes as a psychodrama, turns on a small group of Israeli troops who section off a house in the West Bank into three areas.

The middle-class Palestinian family is shocked, appalled and inconvenienced by the sudden intrusion.

But they gradually learn that the Israelis in their midst are ordinary human beings, just like themselves.

"I found no hatred in this house," said Costanzo, who has a strictly neutral attitude toward the conflict. "This man succeeded in convincing his family to see beyond the Israeli army uniforms, to see the humans."

Originally, Costanzo thought of making a straightforward documentary. But he switched course after being introduced to the Palestinian educator – whose name he prefers to keep anonymous – by an Israeli friend who happens to be a journalist.

The theme of the film clicked in Costanzo's mind after he visited Israel in November 2002, at the height of the current Palestinian uprising.

He wanted to shoot the film in Israel, but could not do so for security and insurance reasons.

So the crew assembled in Italy, where the landscape and architecture are somewhat similar. He used Israeli Arab actors, as well as Israeli Jews, because Palestinian actors are hampered by severe travel restrictions.

Implicitly, Private is political, Costanzo acknowledged in an interview. As he put it, "Someone is occupied and someone is occupying."

But at the end of the day, he added, Israelis and Palestinians are both victims of the violence, which has consumed thousands of lives since the start of the second intifadah in September 2000.

"I see suffering on both sides."

Although Costanzo is not particularly optimistic about the prospects for resolving the conflict in the foreseeable future, he believes that peace is ultimately possible.

Costanzo, who lives in Rome, said that Italian public opinion has a more balanced view of the conflict than in the past.

"Five years ago, Italians were strongly pro-Palestinian. But today, it's not so strong. It's harder to distinguish who's right and who's wrong. Israelis and Palestinians are all really victims. The blood is too much."

Clarification

In the article, "Actor enjoys playing quirky roles," (CJN, Sept. 2), the statement "Britney didn't make it past the audition process," was meant in jest. In fact, Britney Spears and her mother were executive producers of A Mother's Gift, which was based loosely on Spears' experiences, and they were involved in the audition process to choose an actor for the lead role.

Eye on Arts

By Bill Gladstone

PEOPLE OF THE BOOK

As we turn the page into the New Year of 5765, Eye On Arts presents its annual survey of what some people in the arts and literary community are reading.

Toronto writer Michael Kaufman, whose novel The Possibility of Dreaming on A Night Without Stars won the Jewish Book Awards fiction prize in 2001, has been reading Bel Canto, by Ann Patchett (HarperCollins).

"She's a beautiful lyrical writer who takes a hostage-taking incident in South America and turns it into a love story," he said. "It's an amazing meditation on human relations, on the role of art and things beautiful in the midst of terror and fear, and on the capacity of people to make profound human connections across complete cultural, language and political divides."

Bel Canto offers "a lot of enjoyment in terms of the beauty of the writing," as well as "a lot to be learned and thought about," said Kaufman, who is working on a second novel about the baby-boom generation.

"He's coming from an Orthodox perspective and he's a kabbalistic scholar, but it's very much a book meant for the public – it's not in any way a scholarly book," said author Lilian Nattel of The Secret Life of God: Discovering the Divine Within You, by Rabbi David Aaron, published by Shambhala Publications.

Lilian Nattel

Rabbi Aaron is "clearly familiar with current New Age and Eastern philosophies," Nattel said. "He's dealing with questions like, 'How can bad things happen to good people?' and 'What is the reason for evil in the world?' and 'What is the human connection to God?'

"He's kind of an antidote to Madonna. I enjoy the renewal movement, I have sympathy for New Age and I appreciate the Buddhist approach to suffering, but I get irritated by people who are clearly not well-informed and co-opt Kabbalah and Jewish mysticism… It's interesting for me to find a book that comes from somebody who is both well informed and in touch with the outside world."

Nattel's most recent novel The Singing Fire (Knopf Canada) was published in January. She is working on a new novel set in Stalinist Russia.

David Liss's The Coffee Trader (Ballantine Books) "is a real page-turner," according to literary professor Michael Greenstein. "I found it interesting for the historical treatment of the Jewish community in Amsterdam at the beginning of the stock market.

"You get an understanding of the intrigues of the Jewish community at that time, how Spinoza was treated… I think it's a fascinating historic re-creation of that period, and certainly applicable to the current events in North America today."

Greenstein is editor of Contemporary Jewish Writing in Canada: An Anthology, published recently by the University of Nebraska Press.

Elyse Friedman, whose second novel Waking Beauty has just been published by Three Rivers Press, has been reading The Man Who Shocked the World: the Life and Legacy of Stanley Milgram, by Thomas Blass (Basic Books).

A Yale psychology professor in the 1960s, Milgram devised a lab experiment to measure the willingness of people to administer electric shocks to hapless victims under the guise of scientific discovery.

"I think he was influenced by the Holocaust," Friedman said. "He wanted to find out if ordinary individuals could be compelled to conduct acts of evil and, if so, what it would take to make them do so.

"What he discovered with this experiment was that way more people than he expected were quite eager to commit acts of evil if there was an authority figure telling them to do so."

The book provides a full portrait of the Bronx-born scientist, who also invented the notion of "six degrees of separation" to describe how interconnected all human beings are to each other, Friedman said.

"I'm interested because I find social psychology interesting and I've always been fascinated by the social psychology experiments that he did."

Friedman is the author of a previous novel, Then Again, as well as a recent book of poetry, Know Your Monkey (ECW Press). She is currently working on a book of short stories.

Nathaniel Hawthorne's The Scarlet Letter recently won the belated admiration of Norman Ravvin, the author-editor who is chair of the Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies at Concordia University in Montreal.

"I'm drawn to him because of his sharp ethical stance. He's so focused on the way early American communities built themselves on lies, and he's trying to propose an alternative. It's one more take on early American hypocrisy."

Hawthorne and other early American writers provide a "bedrock for literature that we in Canada lack," Ravvin said. "We don't have someone like Hawthorne writing about our beginnings. I'd say that his identity isn't monotheistically Christian but broadly ethical, so there's room there for Jewish forms of ethics and Jewish forms of identity."

Ravvin spent the summer completing a new collection of short stories.

As for me, I recently read David Bezmozgis's outstanding new collection, Natasha and Other Stories (Harper Flamingo), which is a brilliant literary debut by a young writer who is already a celebrated talent. The stories have attracted much praise since some began appearing individually in prestigious publications like the New Yorker and Harper's.

A Soviet-born Torontonian in his early 30s, Bezmozgis writes about the Russian-Jewish immigrant experience and the wave of émigrés who, like his own family, came to Toronto in the 1970s. With Natasha, he does much more than put north Toronto's Russian-Jewish ghetto on the literary map.

At his best, in stories like Tapka, Roman Berman Massage Therapist and the title piece, he delivers a profound yet simplistic, tragicomic statement about the human condition as expertly as Anton Chekhov or Leo Tolstoy. The stories are smart, entertaining and compellingly readable.

Israeli journalist recounts Yom Kippur War

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

THE YOM KIPPUR WAR
THE EPIC ENCOUNTER THAT TRANSFORMED THE MIDDLE EAST

The Yom Kippur War, which erupted 31 years ago in October, was a landmark event both militarily and politically.

Surprised and shocked by Egypt's and Syria's co-ordinated attacks in the Sinai Peninsula and the Golan Heights, Israel was sent reeling in the first few days of the war, all its complacent conceptions about Arab military capabilities shattered.

Although it eventually recovered from the savage blows, Israel emerged from the war "more chastened than triumphant," Abraham Rabinovich observes in his important book, The Yom Kippur War: The Epic Encounter That Transformed The Middle East (Random House Canada).

In political terms, the war was significant, he suggests. The stalemate on the Sinai front gave way to a series of American-sponsored disengagement accords that ultimately led to a peace treaty between Israel and Egypt. Israel and Syria remained implacable enemies, but a ceasefire engineered by U.S. Secretary of State Henry Kissinger ushered in a period of quiet on the Golan.

Rabinovich, who covered the 1973 war as a reporter for the Jerusalem Post, draws a compelling picture of the 19-day conflict, filling his canvas with flowing narrative, rigorous analysis and tales of personal heroism and setbacks.

He begins by recounting the background that triggered the war. In the wake of the 1967 Six Day War, Israel was confident it had attained military superiority over the Arabs. As a result, Israel's deployment of forces on both fronts was remarkably limited. When the Egyptians struck on Oct. 6, only 450 Israeli troops manned the Bar-Lev Line along the Suez Canal.

In 1970, shortly after the close of the War of Attrition, Israel's defence minister, Moshe Dayan, wanted to reduce Egypt's motivation for going to war by pulling back from the canal. But Golda Meir, the prime minister, vetoed his proposal. Nor was she interested in exploring a non-belligerency peace plan floated by Egypt's fairly new president, Anwar Sadat.

Her rejection of Sadat's overture was bolstered by Eli Zeira, Israel's director of military intelligence, who claimed that Egypt would not wage war anytime soon to regain the Sinai. His rosy assessment was disputed by Gen. David Elazar, the chief of staff, and by Zvi Zamir, the head of the Mossad. But Zeira's view took precedence over theirs.

In short, Zeira believed that Egypt would not initiate hostilties unless it had Soviet long-range bombers and Scud missiles capable of neutralizing Israel's air force and hitting Tel Aviv. But Zeira's reading of Egypt's strategy was flawed. In 1972, as Rabinovich points out, Sadat told his generals he would launch a war without waiting any longer for the bombers or missiles.

He and his chief of staff, Gen. Saad el-Shazly, drew up a limited war plan, High Minarets, that envisioned an advance of only about five miles past the canal. They reasoned, correctly as it turned out, that Israel's air superiority could be overcome by a shield of SAM-6 missiles, and that an Egyptain bridgehead in the Sinai would break the current political impasse.

From September 1973 onward, Israel received 11 warnings of an imminent Egyptian and Syrian offensive. King Hussein of Jordan personally delivered one of them. But due, in part, to a clever Egyptian deception plan, Israel disregarded these ominous signals.

Israel, however, beefed up its garrison on the Golan, placed the army on a high alert and authorized air force commander Benny Peled to call up reserves. Without these measures, Israel may well have been defeated.

On the eve of the war, when all signs indicated that the worst-case scenario was on the verge of materializing, Elazar argued for a pre-emptive strike against Syria's airfields. But Meir, wary of the United States' reaction, demurred.

When the war started, Egypt softened up Israeli lines with a massive land and air bombardment. Sadat's half brother, a pilot, was one of the first Egyptian fatalities.

Israel's air force, which had performed brilliantly in the Six Day War, was unable to stem the tide. All told, Israel lost 102 aircraft, one-quarter of its air force, during the war. Syria and Egypt lost more than 400 aircraft.

Incredibly enough, Gen. Shmuel Gonen, the commander of Israel's southern front, dismissed Egypt's canal crossing, a stellar feat, as a failure. Gonen's faulty conclusion was in keeping with Israel's arrogant underestimation of its adversaries.

On the Golan, the Syrians achieved a stunning breakthrough, even though Israel had acquired Syria's updated war plan a week before Yom Kippur. By the second day, Syrian armour had reached the edge of the escarpment and had a splendid view of the Galilee. Rabinovich claims that Syria had no operational plan of continuing the war into Israel, but left open the option of capturing Nazareth.

In his estimation, the fall of Israel's intelligence-gathering facility on Mt. Hermon was "the single most humiliating episode" of the war. Israel recaptured Mt. Hermon, but at the cost of 80 dead and 136 wounded.

On Oct. 8, Israel launched a counter-attack in Sinai, but it was an abysmal failure, and, in the author's words, "the most ignominious day in Israel's military history."

In a bid to relieve the pressure on the southern front and re-establish its deterrent power, Israel tried to knock the Syrians out of the war by hitting strategic targets throughout Syria. Phantoms bombed army and air defence headquarters, as well as ports, refineries, power stations and bridges, but to no avail. Syria did not budge, and the war raged on.

Eventually, in hard-fought battles during which 800 Syrian tanks were destroyed, Israel pushed the Syrians off its sector of the Golan. But Israel's plan to march on Damascus was foiled by an Iraqi expeditionary force – consisting of 500 tanks, 700 armoured personnel carriers and 30,000 soldiers – and by veiled Soviet threats.

In a sop to Arab public opinion, King Hussein dispatched Jordan's Fortieth Armoured Brigade to Syria's assistance. But at the last minute, Syria called off a planned counter-attack that would have included Jordanian, Iraqi, Saudi, Kuwaiti, Moroccan and Palestinian troops.

As for the Palestinians, their sole contribution to the Arab war effort was the firing of 40 Katyusha rockets into northern Israel from Lebanon. There were no incidents in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, surprisingly enough.

Israel regained the initiative in the Sinai by decimating an Egyptian tank force rumbling toward the Gidi pass and by mounting an audacious crossing into western Egypt, or Africa, spearheaded by an insubordinate general named Ariel Sharon.

Sadat and some of his advisors misinterpreted the crossing as a mere raid. Their illusions collapsed as Israel captured a 1,600 kilometre enclave west of the canal and fought a succession of battles, the fiercest being at a place called the Chinese Farm.

As the war reached a crescendo, Israel lunged toward Ismailiya, a port astride the canal, and penetrated Suez, a major logistical base for the Third Army that had been cut off and surrounded. Both operations were unsuccessful and costly. Indeed, Rabinovich describes the thrust into Suez, with 80 dead, as a "misadventure."

Rabinovich reckons that the war, which resulted in the deaths of 2,656 Israelis and many more Arabs, was a considerable political victory for Egypt.

What land Egypt was unable to capture by force of arms it acquired through patient diplomacy. By the late 1980s, all of Sinai, including Taba, adjacent to the Israeli port of Eilat, was in Egypt's hands.

But in regaining Sinai, Egypt had to pay a heavy price – signing a formal peace treaty with Israel.

Berlin bans Islamist conference

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

BERLIN — The Berlin senate Monday banned an Islamist conference slated to take place in the German capital early next month.

German Interior Minister Otto Schily had been pressing for Berlin authorities to stop the Arab Islamic Congress in Europe, which was scheduled for Oct. 1 to 3.

Around 800 participants were expected for the conference to discuss, among other things, "resistance against American Zionist terrorism."

The Simon Wiesenthal Center, an international Jewish human rights group, had called on Germany to ban the meeting.

Berlin authorities have deported the main organizer of the conference for his alleged radical anti-Israel and anti-U.S. stance, authorities said.

Fadi Madi, spokesperson for the International Movement against American and Zionist Globalization and Supremacy, was deported to his home country of Lebanon on Saturday evening, the Berliner Morgenpost reported Sunday.

A Berlin police spokesperson, speaking on customary condition of anonymity, confirmed Madi had been sent back to Beirut.

Madi was the main organizer for the conference, which on its website urges "the liberation of all the occupied territories and countries in struggle against the American-Zionist hegemony and occupation."

Madi had been in Beirut last week drumming up support for the conference, and was confronted by Berlin state authorities when he returned to the German capital and told he would have to leave the country, the Berliner Morgenpost reported.

"Whoever, as a foreign national, does not recognize the laws of our country and uses Germany as a platform from which to campaign against other countries and praise terror attacks forfeits his rights to stay in Germany," Berlin Interior Senator Ehrhart Koerting told the newspaper.

Federal prosecutors had been investigating Madi on suspicion he belonged to a banned organization and approved of the move to deport him, the newspaper reported.

Schily said last week that the conference "seems to fall under the heading of justifying terrorist acts" and that he was working with Berlin authorities to try and ban it.

On Friday, the federal government said the Foreign Ministry had instructed German embassies worldwide to refuse visas to anyone who says they want to attend.

Germany's main Muslim organization, the Central Council of Muslims, sought to distance itself from the conference, with spokesperson Mounir Azzaoui telling the Morgenpost "the organizers are unimportant individuals and splinter groups that are not known to us."

Iranian striker pulls out of soccer match in Israel

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Maccabi Tel Aviv, Maccabi Haifa and Bnei Sakhnin enjoyed mixed results in European club action over the Rosh Hashanah holiday last week. Israeli Premier League champions Haifa edged Dnipro of the Ukraine 1-0 in the UEFA Cup, while Bnei Sakhnin lost 2-0 in an away game to Newcastle in the same competition. Maccabi Tel Aviv was the first of the three to see action when it hosted Bayern Munich in the Champions League on erev Rosh Hashanah and lost 1-0 in front of 30,000 fans in Tel Aviv.

An anti-Israel boycott appeared to intrude on Tel Aviv's match when Bayern striker Vahid Hashemian, an Iranian citizen, ruled himself out of contention with a supposed back problem.

Bayern Munich coach Felix Magath said an injury Hashemian picked up in a league match was more serious than originally believed, but politics was thought to be behind the striker's sudden deterioration in health.

Hashemian's withdrawal eased a potentially difficult situation for the player and the club, after a spokesperson for Iran's sports federation said Iranian athletes were not allowed to travel to Israel, and warned of "consequences" for those who violated the ban.

The spokesperson told Iranian media that Iranian laws are clear.

"The laws forbid any Iranian citizen from travelling to [Israel]," he said. "That includes sports people, and is irrespective of whether they travel as part of a team or as individuals. Those who do not adhere to this law will have to live with the consequences."

Iranian athletes have not been allowed to compete against Israeli athletes at international competitions. At last month's Olympic Games in Athens, an Iranian judoka refused to compete against an Israeli and was given the $120,000 bonus that the two Iranian gold medal winners received.

In another off-field development, Israel's High Court rejected a petition that it stop the game being played on Rosh Hashanah. Two groups petitioned the court, asking it to force various Israeli authorities to prevent the match because it undermined Jewish values. The panel of three judges threw out one plea while the other was withdrawn.

The court said Maccabi and the Israeli Football Association had tried to reschedule the match, but ultimately it was the decision of UEFA, European soccer's ruling body.

"There are many in Israel who were not pleased that the match was set for the eve of Rosh Hashanah, but once the decision was taken and it became clear that the dates would not be changed, the authorities were forced to prepare [for the match]," the judges said in their ruling. "We cannot tell Maccabi not to play the game, and we have no jurisdiction in this matter."

The judges said halting the match would incur huge financial losses and possible expulsion from the competition for the club, and do untold damage to the reputation of Israeli soccer and sport in general.

Bnei Sakhnin fans celebrate their team's victory in Israel's State Cup, which opened the door to UEFA Cup competition.

Maccabi coach Nir Klinger said at the pre-match news conference that appearing in the Champions League was a treasured moment in his life.

"This is the highlight of my career and that of my players," he said. "It is the biggest moment in the history of Israeli soccer. The Champions League is coming to Israel, to Tel Aviv."

"Playing in the Champions League may be our biggest moment so far, but after every peak you scale there is another waiting to be conquered," Klinger said, adding that his players would not be overawed by the occasion even though Bayern is the clear favorite.

Meanwhile, Magath said time constraints would prevent his players from visiting the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial. Bayern Munich's president, Franz Beckenbauer, had earlier urged his club's players to take time out to visit the site.

Swimmer wins gold at youth games

Darren Rubenchik qualified for the JCC Maccabi Games by just a few short weeks when he celebrated his 13th birthday in late June. The Thornhill resident made the most of his opportunity at last month's annual Jewish Community Centre event in the Greater Washington Area, capturing 12 medals in the pool, including seven gold.

Altogether, 77 Toronto athletes came home from Rockville, Md., with 37 medals, including 10 gold, in swimming, baseball, basketball, soccer, golf and tennis.

The boys and girls under-16 golfers won gold, while the boys' soccer and basketball teams won bronze.

As one of the country's top-ranked swimmers, the Grade 8 student at Willowbrook Public School is setting his sights on getting to Beijing in four years time.

"I love to swim freestyle," said Rubenchik, a member of the Richmond Hill Aquatic Club, who previously was the under-11 provincial champion. "I hope to swim for Canada and go to the Olympics in 2008."

Vancouver and Edmonton also fielded teams for the five-day competition, along with participants from Poland, Australia, Venezuela, Mexico, Great Britain, and the host United States.

Montreal, Ottawa and Hamilton competed in the Boston region, while Austin, Tex., and Columbus, Ohio, were also hosts.

The Olympic-style games, held each summer in North America, are the largest organized sports program for Jewish teens worldwide.

They were first held in 1982 and grew from a small pilot project in one host community to this year's event, in which more than 6,000 teenagers, 13 to 16, took part in four host cities. Since 1991, the games have been hosted in a number of North American cities to permit as many participants as possible.

"It incorporates athletic competition with a Jewish experience and gives the kids a taste of being Jewish," said Grant Smith, the Toronto delegate's facilitator representing the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre. "[The goal is] to have them realize there's other Jewish kids who play sports just like they do."

The courage to change

something

By MIRIAM PORTER

The year 5765 is going to be magnificent. In the superficial part of my brain that dreams about fashionable clothing, I am finally able to afford the very expensive and stylish black boots that literally moulded to my legs when I tried them on. (I have gone back to see them often, like visiting a puppy in a pet store.) My vain fantasy also includes a Prada purse, a day at the Stillwater Spa and dinner at a swank restaurant in downtown Toronto.

On a much deeper level (beyond shopping and spending money that I have yet to earn), I imagine 5765 as a year filled with love, truth, honesty, hope, peace and happiness in the world. As the anonymous poem goes, "Accept the things you cannot change, have the courage to change the things you can, and the wisdom to know the difference."

The most difficult part for me has always been accepting that there are some things I can't change. I have learned – the hard way – that it's not possible to change people to suit your own needs, no matter how hard you try, whether it's your boyfriend/girlfriend, family member or close friend. This coming year, I will do my best to accept others as they are and not judge them.

In the New Year, I would like the strength and courage to change the things I can. I believe if we work together, we can have a positive effect on the lives of other people. I know we can help the suffering people of Sudan; we can put an end to anti-Semitism; we can make our voices heard; we can feed the hungry people in the streets of Toronto; we can end needless animal suffering; we can follow our dreams; and we can do tzedakah and tikkun olam every day of our lives.

I want the wisdom to know the difference between what I can and cannot change. My good friend and mentor recently told me to "daven for clarity and partnership with God." I believe that with clarity, we will gain the insight to know the difference, and when we have a partnership with God, anything is possible.

Many of us make New Year's resolutions and learn from our past experiences and mistakes. Despite the spiritual differences between the Jewish and secular new years, they share one similarity: we look back at the past year and plan our changes for the year to come.

This column will be published in time for the Days of Awe, the 10 days starting with Rosh Hashanah and ending with Yom Kippur. It's a time for serious introspection and reconciliation with people we may have wronged during the previous year. The changes we make and actions we take during the Days of Awe are crucial. The most important things to consider are tshuvah, tfillah and tzedakah – repentance, prayer, and good deeds/charity. The idea that on Rosh Hashanah God decides, provisionally, "Who shall live and who shall die" but that our actions during the Days of Awe can alter this decree reminds me what is important in life.

The truth is, I don't need the Prada bag. I am quite happy with the cute purse I got on sale for $20. Instead of a day at the spa, I would be just as content with a swim in a beautiful lake surrounded by trees. Instead of dinner at an expensive restaurant, I would gladly accept a picnic in the park with someone I love and use the money I save to buy a meal for someone living on the street.

This year, before Yom Kippur is upon us, I respectfully suggest that we all consider the individual changes we want to make in the year 5765.

Shanah Tovah.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

Some readers who are parents of children in Jewish schools may have heard of a term used in curriculum design: spiral curriculum. Put simply, a spiral design in subject matter determines a base of information at the first stage of learning and then adds new information at each grade level that supplements and complements a growing sphere of knowledge.

It is much easier to understand how this works if I provide you with a concrete example, and what better illustration at this time of year than the Book of Jonah, which is read on Yom Kippur afternoon.

Each year, in learning about the Yamim Nora'im, Jewish students, old and young, are exposed to this book. In a spiral curriculum, we can mine the riches of these fascinating four chapters in age-appropriate bits, whereby we always know that there's more to learn as we grow from kindergarten to old age.

Jonah is particularly suited to spiral teaching because of the enigmatic content of the text, which demands commentary on many levels of sophistication. A young child can fantasize about life in the belly of a great fish. An older child can follow the storyline and look for narrative problems. (And there are many!) A teen could relate to Jonah's Chapter 1 rebellion and his return in Chapter 3. A young adult might identify with the universal message of the Chapter 1 sailors and the Chapter 3 Ninevites. It will probably be that most difficult of passages, Chapter 4, that will challenge the experienced intelligence of an adult reader.

The properly designed spiral curriculum, while it is used in many schools, is also useful in our private Jewish study habits for a variety of reasons:

- Students never need to unlearn something taught in an earlier setting.
- The learner is always building on an existing structure, which helps to stabilize the content.
- Subject matter is always age-appropriate.
- One always knows that at an advanced level, there is more to come.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Be a child – kick a can

URBAN WRITER

Our children are beautiful, and we were beautiful as children.

I know a nine-year old child who recently told me that she decided to stop cracking her knuckles one at a time, so as not to get overwhelmed by the job of stopping cold turkey all at once. I was intrigued.

An adult friend of mine told me that, as a child, she used to see auras of colours around people, like greenish reds and purplish-blues. As she grew older, she stopped divulging this important information to adults because of the disbelieving looks on their faces. Apparently, many children see similar auras.

A long time ago, I stood in front of an emergency ward waiting for a friend. A local rabbi was there with her son, a five-year-old, who was clearly a very aware child. A car sat nearby with its engine running and I said to her son that the man should shut off his engine so as to comply with the sign asking people to do so.

He turned to me with the most angelic look and said, "That's not what the sign says." I responded politely, thinking that perhaps he was too young to read it thoroughly, and said, "Well, honey, it does say that," and then I proceeded to read it. Once again, he replied, "No it doesn't say that at all. It says it's OK to keep your car running."

Finally after a few back-and-forths, he turned to me confidently and stated, "Look, I'm five years old and we kids see things differently than you adults, and that's how I read the sign –like a kid."

I was halted in my tracks. To me, I had entered into the realm of Peter Pan where the magic of imagination and creative wonderment comes alive. I recall the warmth that travelled through me as though I was watching the birth of a calf.

His response was anything but mundane, and it made me consider that maybe Jewish folklore has it right when it states that we are born knowing "truth" but our ability to access it becomes encumbered as we get older.

I write this because I am sometimes saddened at how we respond to children when they allow us into their precious castle of imagination and awe and we dismiss it as silly childish prattle and nattering.

I write this column as encouragement to my fellow adults to sing as loud as the army at Jericho, and dance recklessly and wildly the way we do around the table of the bride and groom as the night wears on.

Remember how we used to dance, and spin about until we toppled over from dizziness, and how, despite the fact we were tone deaf, we would sing forcefully just like our friends who were destined to be virtuosos. It didn't matter that our voices were different, because we were singing and we reveled in excitement through our personal instrument, our own gift from God.

Be a child, in the way adults can be. Others may laugh and poke fun, but they are likely craving to do the same and return to a time, still inside them, that is as colourful as Joseph's coat of many colours.

Encourage the creative truth in your child and explore that same magnificence in yourself. Late at night, when you're walking home from a Torah class, kick a stick or a can, and then boot it again. Stare endlessly at the butterfly perched on your shoulder and watch the ant as it carries a weight three times its own.

Be in the moment, because within it you will find the holy laughter and awe of childhood that we all used to carry with us.

Life is a challenge. Be goofy. It's a blessing.

UJA FEDERATION CAMPAIGN 2005

A VOICE IN THE WORLD

A Campaign to Strengthen Israel

The statistics are staggering. Nearly 7,000 injured Israelis and close to 1,000 Israeli fatalities after four years of terror involving 23,000 attacks, attempted attacks or clashes with Israel's security forces. Nearly one in five Israeli families lives below the poverty line. Over one quarter of Israel's elderly face severe financial hardship. Yet, remarkably, in the face of staggering security costs, Israel's economy is starting a slow recovery from its worst recession ever. Your gift to UJA Federation Campaign 2005, will be invested in several high impact social welfare initiatives, to fortify Israel and advance her economic revival.

When your canvasser calls, please support this critical UJA Federation campaign to strengthen our voice in the world and create a safe Jewish future for our children.

CAMPAIGN 2005 ACTION PLAN

- Providing enhanced security for community institutions
- Speaking out forcefully on urgent Jewish issues
- Building a stronger Israel
- Empowering a new generation to deal with hatred

Anglican leaders urge Israel divestment

By DAPHNA BERMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Leading members of the Anglican church will recommend that their decision-making body adopt an anti-Israel financial divestment policy similar to the one the Presbyterian church passed earlier this summer.

The announcement, made Sept. 21 in Jerusalem by representatives of the Anglican Peace and Justice Network (APJN), came at the close of the delegation's 10-day tour of the region.

"We will return home and recommend that the Anglican Consultative Council [(ACC), the church's decision-making body] adopt a resolution calling for divestment from Israel, and if our delegation is representative of the larger Anglican sentiment, then I'd say we're in good shape," Dr. Jenny Te Paa, who led the APJN delegation, told Ha'aretz.

The approximately 30 APJN delegates, who were appointed by region and represent the church's extensive global network, will make their official recommendation to the ACC in June 2005, when the body meets formally in Wales.

Before that, in February 2005, delegates will address an international meeting of archbishops in London, to convince spiritual leaders, including the archbishop of Canterbury, that divestment is a "moral" imperative.

Justice for Jewish refugees from Arab lands

Group in France determined to raise awareness

By PHILIP CARMEL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — When the International Court of Justice ruled in July that Israel's West Bank security barrier was illegal, Yves-Victor Kamami, a former president of B'nai Brith France and an executive member of the CRIF umbrella organization of French Jews, learned a valuable lesson.

"The lesson of the security barrier is that everything is now an issue for the courts," he said. "There will come a point when the permanent borders of Israel are settled and then the world will move on to the issue of the refugees. We have to be ready for that."

Kamami recently set up the International Federation of Jewish Refugees From Muslim-Arab Countries.

Golfing for Cancer

KELOWNA, B.C. — The Okanagan Jewish Community (OJC) held its annual golf tournament with the B.C. Cancer Agency's Centre for the Southern Interior this year and raised more than $21,000, the OJC announced. Half the proceeds from the mid-summer event went to the centre's prostate brachytherapy equipment campaign to bring a new prostate cancer treatment to Kelowna. The other half will go to an OJC education fund.

WORLD

Protocols Removed

NEW YORK — Wal-Mart removed the anti-Semitic tract The Protocols of the Elders of Zion from its online retailing website in the United States last week after complaints from Jewish groups. A Wal-Mart spokesperson said the book, a forgery that describes a Jewish plan for world domination, is no longer for sale because of customer feedback. The Simon Wiesenthal Center called for the book to be taken off the site, while the Anti-Defamation League wanted the store to put up a disclaimer. Amazon.com, and Barnes and Noble also sell the book online, and some versions carry disclaimers about it. Wal-Mart, however, did not, and the ADL said its description of the book framed its legitimacy as an open question: "Although there may be final evidence [it's a forgery], we have not seen a clear and convincing version of it produced by those making the claim." Canadian bookseller Chapters.indigo.ca doesn't carry the book.

Imam Gets Jail Time

CLEVELAND — A Palestinian-born leader of a U.S. mosque was sentenced to jail last week for lying about his connection to terrorist groups when he applied for U.S. citizenship. Fawaz Damra, the imam of the Islamic Center of Cleveland, received two months in prison and four months house arrest. Damra was convicted in June of lying about his ties to terrorist groups, including Islamic Jihad. The judge did not comment on a prosecutor's request that he be deported.

Hate Postings Arrest

NEW YORK — A New York man was arrested for recruiting children to post pro-Nazi and pro-white supremacist stickers on buildings, including a synagogue. The New York Times reported last week that Thomas Zibelli was charged with criminal mischief and aggravated harassment. The prosecutor urged the charges be labelled hate crimes.

Just a Vacation Video?

BAKU, Azerbaijan — Security forces in Azerbaijan arrested an Iranian man who said he was videotaping the Israeli Embassy in Baku for its beautiful architecture. Israeli officials believe the man was collecting information for Iranian intelligence. He was detained Sept. 1, but the arrest was only made public last week.

WJC Fires VP

NEW YORK — The World Jewish Congress has asked its senior vice-president to halt all his activities on behalf of the organization and fired him from its steering committee. Isi Leibler, who had raised questions about financial irregularities at the WJC, was dismissed at a meeting last week in New York of its steering committee. At the meeting, Edgar Bronfman, the WJC's longtime president and its largest financial supporter, said he would run for another five-year term. He had been expected to step down in 2006. Leibler's firing came after a spat at congress' helm raised questions about the leadership and finances.

N.Z. Grounds Irving

LOS ANGELES — Holocaust denier David Irving plans to challenge the ban on his entry into New Zealand. Irving was prevented from boarding a flight in Los Angeles on Sept. 16 when an urgent fax was sent by New Zealand officials to the airport, ordering airline officials to bar him from boarding a plane headed for New Zealand. Irving wished to enter the country to speak at the National Press Club in Wellington, but when he announced his intention in late July, New Zealand officials said they would block his entry.

Haifa U Freezes Donation from ex-Post Chair

JERUSALEM — Haifa University has decided to freeze a donation from Canadian David Radler, a former top executive at Hollinger Inc. and the ex-chairman of the Jerusalem Post, after learning of allegations the money was misappropriated from the Post's charitable fund, Ha'aretz reported.

But the university has decided not to revoke the honorary doctorate it gave Radler in exchange for a $75,000 contribution. University officials said the money is only a small part of the sum he promised to contribute for the honorary title.

Radler and company CEO Conrad Black were accused in a report submitted to the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission of running a "corporate kleptocracy," lining their pockets at the expense of the media corporation's stockholders. The report was submitted by a special committee of inquiry looking into alleged misdealings inside Hollinger International Inc., which owns the Post. The pair are being sued by Hollinger shareholders for misappropriating company funds.

The report quotes former Post publisher Tom Rose as saying that Radler wanted to contribute money to Haifa U and receive an honorary doctorate by transferring part of the sum – $25,000 – from the Post's charitable fund, which was set up some 70 years ago to collect money for the needy. The report says Rose warned Radler against transferring the fund as a personal contribution, but Radler insisted.

University officials refused to say from whom the money was received and whether it was on Post Charitable Fund cheques. University sources confirmed to Ha'aretz earlier this month that Radler transferred $75,000 for the honorary title. They said this is standard practice in academic institutes.

New version of The Diary of Anne Frank set to open

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Wendy Kesselman's 1997 adaptation of The Diary of Anne Frank will make its Toronto debut Oct. 5 at the Bathurst Street Theatre.

Known as an uncensored, more Jewish version of the 1955 Broadway play, it includes new material from the famous journal by the foremost icon of the Holocaust. Excerpts detailing Anne's thoughts on sexuality and her frustration with her mother were deleted by Anne's father Otto when he first allowed the diary to be published, but today, says director Alexander Galant, these issues aren't so taboo.

"Anne doesn't think so differently than what a 13-year-old girl thinks today," Galant says, adding that young audiences can relate to someone who also likes boys, enjoys dancing and argues with her mother.

The cast includes Jennifer Waiser as Anne, Andrew Gillies as Otto Frank, Carol Lampert as Edith Frank and Sarah Dodd as Mrs. Van Daan.

Galant believes it's the right time to stage this important play in Toronto. "Last spring, when those vandals painted swastikas in the city, I thought 'How can this happen now, with what we know?'"

Anne's story and perspective is still very relevant, Galant says. "It's one thing to say six million Jews died, but it's another thing to see a face witnessing that horror."

The Toronto show is not the only testament to the ongoing interest in her tale: the book The Diary of Anne Frank has sold 25 million copies in 100 languages, while a new exhibit of photographs taken by Otto Frank premiered in New York in May. As well, an ABC TV adaptation of The Diary of Anne Frank won an Emmy for best miniseries in 2001, and a CD-ROM released the same year, titled Anne Frank House: A House with a Story, offers a virtual tour of the secret annex in Amsterdam where the Frank family hid.

Seventy-five years after her birth and 60 years after her death, Anne is still a symbol of hope, Galant says.

Rule of law at the UN?

From the editor's desk

September brings us the annual dazzling showcase of nature we know as the autumn. It also brings us the annual dazzling showcase of the United Nations' General Assembly we know as political theatre.

Leaders from around the world take 15-minute turns at the marble rostrum in the assembly's august chamber, addressing their peers from the 191 countries that comprise the General Assembly.

Sometimes, of course, those leaders speak less to their peers and more to the empty seats in which their peers would have been sitting had they been in attendance to hear their colleagues' speeches.

Such was case, alas, for our Prime Minister Paul Martin when he he took his turn last week at the dais. There were more empty chairs than there were attentive leaders of state.

But he spoke forcefully and admirably nevertheless, castigating the UN for its ineptitude in the Darfur crisis. "While the international community struggles with definitions, the people of Darfur struggle with disaster," Martin correctly observed.

He also urged the UN member states to change the rules of the organization to become more interventionist in saving lives in situations of clear human rights and humanitarian calamities when countries abuse their own citizens.

The newspapers reported, charitably, that "Prime Minister Martin's speech was met with only polite applause."

On the other hand, President Robert Mugabe, Zimbabwe's tyrannical leader, received a much more effusive response by essentially heaping scorn on the very notion of more intervention in the affairs of nations who oppress and victimize their own people.

It was political theatre of the most macabre sort, a pitiful play that voids human life of any sanctity and language of any real meaning. How sad. How dangerous.

But the theatre rings not only from the portentous, self-serving sounds of the member states' leaders. It tolls from the very structure of the organization, whose dysfunction and menace are tolerated and sometimes encouraged by its top executive.

The day before Prime Minister Martin addressed the General Assembly, Secretary General Kofi Annan spoke. The theme of his remarks, broadly speaking, was an appeal for respect for the rule of law. Most commentators interpreted Annan's remarks as a non-subtle rebuke of U.S. President George W. Bush for his decision to go to war in Iraq.

"Today, the rule of law is at risk around the world, " Annan proclaimed. "Again and again, we see fundamental laws shamelessly disregarded – those that ordain respect for innocent life, for civilians, for the vulnerable – especially children."

The secretary general spoke of "fundamental laws shamelessly disregarded." How, then, can he be so blind, so uncaring of the virtually complete disdain, let alone disregard, of fundamental laws – fairness and equal treatment, for example – regarding Israel at the UN?

We are not talking here about the unfairness of attitude in the knee-jerk, reflexive, automatic hostility toward Israel on the part of the large number of states of the Islamic Conference. We are talking about the unfairness of the very UN system toward Israel.

"At the international level, all states – strong and weak, big and small – need a framework of fair rules, which each can be confident that others will obey. Fortunately, such a framework exists… This is one of our organization's proudest achievements."

How can the secretary general talk about "a framework of fair rules" at the level of international law, when the very body of which he is the head and whose rules he touts, structurally discriminates against the only Jewish state on earth.

Only the Jewish state, for example, is excluded from a rotational seat on the Security Council. Why? Because Israel's regional neighbours, who take temporary turns sitting on the Security Council, foreclose that possibility. What has the secretary general done to remedy this discrimination?

It is, at its least, reckless negligence and, at its worst, sly hypocrisy, for the secretary general to bemoan the lack of respect for the rule of law among nation-states, when there is no respect for the rule of law in the United Nations. He presides over an institution that mocks the very idea of the rule of law. It scorns law and makes no effort whatsoever to incorporate fairness in its procedures. It derides morality and decency in favour of sheer politics and brazen self-interest.

The numerous, unbalanced votes and resolutions against Israel bespeak a malevolent obsession with the Jewish state out of all proportion to the space it occupies on earth or in the political affairs of mankind. From the very rostrum where the secretary general spoke last week, from the many international conferences bearing the logo and imprimatur of the UN, from the standing and special committees that meet under UN auspices and from the International Court of Justice whose docket the UN dictates, vile anti-Jewish statements, not heard since the darkest of the dark ages, have become common discourse.

If Secretary General Annan is disinclined to apply the rule of law within his own precincts, it little credits him to talk of it within the framework of international law. —MBD

CanWest defends policy on use of word 'terrorist'

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

CanWest Global Communications, publisher of 13 daily newspapers in Canada including the National Post, will continue to use the word "terrorist" in Reuters dispatches, to describe those who commit terrorist attacks.

But the chain will probably bow to Reuters' request that reporters' names be dropped from articles in which those changes are made, says Scott Anderson, editor in chief of CanWest Global.

Anderson told The CJN last week that CanWest newspapers will stick to their style guide, written in consultation with executives and editors across the chain, which calls for the word "terrorist" to be used to describe "individuals or groups responsible for attacks on civilians for political purposes."

> 'Individuals or groups responsible for attacks on civilians for political purposes'

Anderson said the policy to substitute "terrorist" and "terrorism" for Reuters' softer words will continue.

And he said he's unmoved by one reason Reuters gave for its opposition to CanWest's policy: That using the word terrorist could endanger a reporter covering a volatile area.

"My response is, that's the price we pay as journalists," Anderson said.

But, he added, although executives are "not yet sure" how to handle the controversy, it's likely CanWest papers will remove the bylines of Reuters reporters whose stories are altered in this way.

The dispute came to light last week, when Reuters responded to the policy adopted earlier this year by CanWest Global to substitute in their articles the word "terrorist" for terms like "insurgents" and "rebels."

"Our editorial policy is that we don't use emotive words when labelling someone," David A. Schlesinger, Reuters' global managing editor, told the New York Times on Sept. 20. "Any paper can change copy and do whatever they want. But if a paper wants to change our copy that way, we would be more comfortable if they remove the byline."

As a policy, Reuters said it avoids words like "terrorist" and "terrorism," preferring "the absence of emotion… so that events may be judged dispassionately."

Schlesinger said he was concerned that changes like those made at CanWest could lead to "confusion" about what Reuters is reporting and possibly endanger its reporters or threaten their association with sources.

Anderson responded by asking if a reporter is "couching language to protect people, are you telling the truth?"

Paul Michaels of the Canada-Israel Committee, who monitors anti-Israel bias in the media for the lobby group, praised CanWest for sticking to its policy.

"CanWest is taking a principled position," he said. "The word 'terrorist' should be not be used indiscriminately. But when civilians are targeted for deliberate maiming and killing, that is terrorism. Any other term is inaccurate.

"Journalists shouldn't sidestep calling a spade a spade. When they do, they're doing a disservice to their craft."

Michaels called Reuters' policy "craven" and "wrong."

A Sept. 18 National Post editorial seemed to deepen the rift between CanWest and Reuters. The paper said the wire agency's "use of euphemisms" such as "militant," "insurgent" and "extremist" to describe figures in the Middle East and Iraq "merely serves to apply a misleading gloss of political correctness."

The Post editorial concluded: "We believe we owe it to our readers to remove it before they see their newspapers every morning."

A Reuters official was quoted as saying his company hadn't responded to the Post's editorial.

Klezmer concert a fusion of old and new

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

From the moment the Toronto klezmer ensemble Beyond the Pale opened the annual Yiddish summer concert held this year at Beth Sholom Synagogue, the tone was set for a new generation of Yiddish sounds.

Those who expected traditional Yiddish favourites such as Oifn Pripitchuk and Rozhinkes mit Mandlen were treated to a fusion of sounds that reflect the melding of Yiddish music – old and new.

Although there was less singalong, the musicians performed with passion and technical excellence. Their choice of music included their own original compositions.

The more than 700 people there, who filled nearly all the seats in the sanctuary, listened to Yiddish diva Adrienne Cooper; singer Mitch Smolkin, who was also the artistic director of Ashkenaz 2004; Marilyn Lerner, piano accompanist; Annette Bjorling on Celtic harp; and Kurt Bjorling on clarinet.

Cooper, a mezzo-soprano, is a master of shadings and phrasings. In her relaxed yet emotional style, she served up some lively renditions of folk songs, The Borsht Monologues, with text by Meir Kharatz and music by Yefim Chorny.

She sang Crotona Park and Langsam un likhtikn, based on text by the poet Anna Margolin, with music by Lerner.

Smolkin, who has become one of Canada's most renowned Jewish vocalists, demonstrated his versatility as a soloist and his ability to perform with other artists. He joined Cooper in Morris Winchevsky's Di tsukunft and teamed up with the Bjorlings, who presented several pieces for clarinet and harp in a new composition, Deenele.

For the fifth year in a row, Beyond the Pale, led by composer Eric Stein, on mandolin and mandocello, played an eclectic repertoire. The group's repertoire reflected the theme of the evening, "Songs of Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow."

Beyond the Pale's clarinetist, Martin van de Ven, presented his original composition, Whassat. Other Beyond the Pale musicians include Bogdan Djukic on violin, Bret Higgins on bass, and Milos Popovic on accordion.

The whole ensemble joined in for a rousing singalong at the concert's closing with the ever-favourite Zol Zein Shalom.

Ethel Sum Cooper, past chair of the UJA Federation Committee for Yiddish, speaking in Yiddish and English, thanked Bess Shockett, the chair of the concert and Rhea Shulman, the acting chair of the committee for Yiddish, for their efforts in arranging the successful concert.

Susan Jackson, director of strategic community planning and engagement for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, brought greetings from the federation, entertaining the audience with her quick wit and ability to make even the most simple story entertaining.

The concert was produced by the UJA Federation Committee for Yiddish, in co-operation with Ashkenaz Foundation and with the support of the Toronto Arts Council.

Ethel Cooper asked the Jewish community "to throw its support behind the continuity of Yiddish.

"The language, its history and culture is the foundation of our Ashkenazi Jewish community here in Toronto. The Committee for Yiddish, UJA Federation, is working tirelessly to ensure that Yiddish and its vast treasures [are] pass[ed] on to forthcoming generations."

She announced that there are many classes for children and adults, including Yiddish courses at the University of Toronto and York University. She asked for support through donations and from volunteers for two new projects, the Yiddish Community Theatre and the Yiddish Education and Cultural Centre.

An abstruse catechism

Last week, representatives of the Anglican Peace and Justice Network (APJN), leading members of the worldwide Anglican Church, announced that they will soon be calling upon their church to adopt an anti-Israel divestment policy similar to the one the Presbyterian church passed earlier this summer. The announcement came at the end of a whirlwind tour, primarily through the West Bank and Gaza.

"We will return home and recommend that the Anglican Consultative Council – the church's decision-making body – adopt a resolution calling for divestment from Israel, and if our delegation is representative of the larger Anglican sentiment, then I'd say we're in good shape," Dr. Jenny Te Paa, the leader of the APJN delegation said.

We beg to differ. In our view, their shape is morally twisted.

As reported in Ha'aretz, the delegation toured extensively in the West Bank and met with Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat in Ramallah. Oh yes, they also met with Israeli member of Knesset, Azmi Bishara.

Rev. Brian J. Grieves of the United States said he hoped the recommendation would "bring an end to the conflict." His colleague Archdeacon Taimalelagi Tuatagola-Matalavea, the Anglican observer at the United Nations, further elaborated by explaining that the recommendation was "so that Christian faiths can bring peace to this land."

It is a pity that the 30-member APJN arrived in Israel just before the suicide murder of 16 Israelis in Be'er Sheva by Palestinians seeking to "bring an end to the conflict" in the Hamas manner. More is the pity that the wise travellers of the purple cloth had already completed their fact-finding mission when a Palestinian woman seeking "to bring an end to the conflict" after the fashion of the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades killed the two Israeli border police who prevented her from killing scores of innocents waiting for a bus at a city bus stop.

But the Peace and Justice seekers were indeed still on their tour when, as reported by Palestine Media Watch, "a new and striking hate music video, titled The Game, started appearing on Palestinian Authority TV promoting the usual by PA message that Israel and/or Jews are behind all world conflict and suffering." This incitement against Israelis and Jews is standard broadcasting policy of PA TV, as it is the standard message in PA newspapers, radio and mosques.

That the Palestinians hate the control Israel exerts over their lives is indisputable. But that the majority of Israelis also hate it is indisputable too. That control is coming to an end in Gaza.

Whether it comes to an end in the West Bank is up to the corrupt, prevaricating PA leadership that clearly prefers making peace with Hamas, Islamic Jihad, Hezbollah and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades rather than with Israel.

How blackmailing and extorting Israel, or people and companies that do business with Israel, will help bring about an end to the conflict is too abstruse a catechism for us to understand, condone or accept.

It is also morally repugnant.

Ontario government should atone

It saddens me to have to refuse the Ontario government's New Year's greetings that were issued to our community in the pages of The CJN (Sept. 15).

Given its uncompromisingly callous attitude to the educational needs of our community and other non-Catholic faith communities in Ontario, the government's greetings are empty.

The first thing the government did after the election was to rescind the Equity in Education Tax Credit (EETC), a move that inflicted hardships on many hard-working, middle-class, faith-based Ontario families.

The Liberal party lied to the public about the situation, by claiming that the EETC was intended to provide benefit primarily to the wealthy patrons of private schools. Not true, as there are wealthy patrons in the Catholic system, too.

Maybe someday I can be more receptive and accept greetings from this government. With the Day of Atonement, the time when we pause to reflect about any wrongs that we have committed in the past, fresh in our memory, it might behoove the provincial government to reflect on the hurt and pain it has inflicted on the non-Catholic faith communities in Ontario.

Kunin's philanthropy

At a time when health-care funding is at great risk, people who support crucial initiatives need to be lauded for their vision and generosity. Unfortunately, the article in The CJN regarding funding challenges facing the Assistive Technology Clinic ("Computer technology comes to aid of ALS patients," Sept. 15), for people with amyotrophic lateral sclerosis (ALS), incorrectly stated that "the support of the Kunin-Lunenfeld Foundation that gives the clinic its name is being withdrawn this month" In fact, nothing could be further from the truth.

The late Reuben Kunin was an incredibly generous individual committed to making the world a better place. As president of the Samuel Lunenfeld Charitable Foundation, Kunin made a career of helping the underdog. Although he had no personal contact with ALS, he was fascinated by the ability of our clinic to affect the lives of people who had nowhere else to turn. When he learned of the clinic's critical need for funds, he quickly responded, which allowed the program to grow. In appreciation of his unstinting support, the clinic now proudly carries his name.

The clinic's current funding crisis is a result of the loss of a grant from the now-defunct ALS Society of Metropolitan Toronto. Coupled with the clinic's inability to secure additional Ministry of Health funding, the program is very much at risk. While support from prospective donors continues to be sought, the board of the Samuel Lunenfeld Charitable Foundation has once again demonstrated its incredible generosity by increasing its support to help make up part of the shortfall.

On behalf of all those patients with ALS who benefit from our program, it is most important that the memory of Reuben Kunin be recognized as a shining star in the world of philanthropy.

Maimonides' year of birth

On the cover of the Rosh Hashanah supplement on Maimonides (CJN, Sept. 15), it is stated 1135 was the year Maimonides was born. All the hits on the Google website give the same date. However, both Arthur Hyman and Eric Lawee write that he was born in 1138, a discrepancy of three years! How is it that Hyman and Lawee disagree with all other opinions? I'm sure your readers would appreciate if you could get to the bottom of this.

Editor's note: We accept the Hyman and Lawee statements for the date in which Maimonides was born. Recent scholarship states that Maimonides was born in 1138.

Islamic religious courts

I was surprised to learn that a judgment of a beit din was legally enforceable in family matters and horrified to learn that B'nai Brith supported Islamic religious courts ("B'nai Brith supports Islamic religious courts," CJN, Sept. 15.)

I can understand where a beit din or religious court would be useful in the same way that mediation is, but would not want to give up my secular legal rights.

There is every likelihood that an Islamic religious court would be run by the current dominant Muslim group, that is, by Islamists. This would be extremely bad for Muslim women and Muslim moderates. For the sake of the Canadian legal system and for our moderate Muslim brothers and sisters, B'nai Brith should oppose Islamic religious courts, and if necessary for fairness, suggest that Jews give up the right of the beit din to make binding legal decisions.

Official heading AIPAC probe linked to anti-Semitism case

By EDWIN BLACK
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — David Szady, the senior FBI counterintelligence official currently heading the controversial investigation of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), is well-known to senior Jewish communal officials, who assert he has targeted Jews in the past.

Now, an investigation reveals that Szady was involved in a well-publicized case involving a Jewish former CIA staff attorney who sued the FBI, the CIA and its top officials for religious discrimination.

Although not named in the suit, Szady headed the elite department that former CIA Director George Tenet admitted in 1999 was involved with "insensitive, unprofessional and highly inappropriate" language regarding the case of attorney Adam Ciralsky.

The AIPAC investigation, which CBS broke last month on the eve of the Republican convention, is believed to focus on a Pentagon official suspected of passing a classified draft policy statement on Iran to AIPAC, the pro-Israel lobby, which allegedly then passed it on to Israel.

AIPAC denies any wrongdoing and has called the alleged charges "baseless." But the case cast a spotlight on the venerable lobbying organization and has sent shock waves through the Jewish community.

Jewish communal officials and members of Congress have protested the investigation and the media frenzy around it, calling for an investigation into who leaked the investigation and for what purpose.

Many questions remain unresolved, including who initiated the investigation, believed to have begun two years ago, and why.

Szady, who was appointed by President George W. Bush in 2001 to head a little-known intelligence interagency unit, the National Counter Intelligence Policy Board, returned to the FBI about two years ago, becoming assistant director for counterintelligence.

Jewish communal officials familiar with Szady assert he has targeted Jews, blocked or slowed their clearances and squeezed minor security violators.

"He's bad, very bad," declared one senior Jewish organizational executive, who, like all those familiar with Szady, declined to speak for the record.

According to exclusively obtained documents, Szady was directly involved in the Ciralsky case. He is identified in the documents as the chief of the CIA's counterespionage group, known as CEG, which was later accused of targeting Ciralsky for being Jewish and a supporter of Israel.

Szady would not respond directly to a request for an interview, but FBI spokesperson Cassandra Chandler said, "David Szady has informed me that he has no anti-Semitic views, has never handled a case or investigation based upon an individual's ethnicity or religious views, and would never do so."

Of the AIPAC investigation in particular, Chandler said: "Investigations are predicated upon information of possible illegal or intelligence activity. The suggestion that the FBI or any FBI official has influenced this investigation based on moral, ethnic or religious bias is simply unfounded, untrue, and contrary to the very values the FBI holds highest."

Ciralsky's problems began as soon as he joined the CIA's legal staff as a junior member in early December 1996. Within days, CIA security personnel began creating a special file on Ciralsky and his Jewish background, according to the documents.

One Dec. 19, 1996, internal CIA memo on Ciralsky indicated that a CIA supervisor "would like to keep current on developments for damage control purposes."

By Jan. 15, 1997, the agency had created a four-page annotated "Jewish resumé" on Ciralsky, which was classified "secret." The resumé listed Ciralsky's teenage trips to Israel in 1987 with the Milwaukee federation and for Passover in 1988, his camp counsellor stint at the Milwaukee JCC's day camp, and his minor in Judaic studies at George Washington University. His major in international affairs was not mentioned.

Shortly thereafter, CIA security personnel were asking whether Ciralsky's nephew might be working with the Israeli government, according to documents; the nephew was only about five months old at the time.

By May 1997, Szady, a 32-year veteran of the FBI, had joined the CIA as chief of the counterespionage group, within the CIA's counterintelligence centre. A presidential directive mandates that an independent FBI official serve as chief of CEG.

Although Szady was not in his post when Ciralsky was hired, shortly after Szady assumed his new position, the counterespionage group appeared determined to terminate Ciralsky.

On June 12, 1997, a memo titled, "Spot Report – Next Steps in the Adam Ciralsky Case" was circulated by Szady's department, outlining what would be done to force Ciralsky from the agency.

The report and the routing slips were tagged with classifications such as "sensitive," "restricted handling" and "eyes only, no registries," thus ensuring that the documents would not end up in any formal and traceable file.

Although Szady's name is blocked out, his bureaucratic initials, C/CEG/CIC, on two routing pages, plus the hand-written acknowledgment next to his initials, show he received the "spot report" the day it was written, according to sources with personal knowledge of the case.

By September 1997, unable to find any incriminating information on Ciralsky, Szady's CEG assigned teams of investigators to ramp up the pressure with multiple interrogations, according to documents.

One CEG investigator's memo on Sept. 12, 1997, suggests questions for interrogators to ask Ciralsky, such as, "What is your family's relation with Israeli President Ezer Wizman (sic)?"

This question was based on the fact that Ciralsky is a distant relative of Ezer Weizman, who was Israel's president at the time.

The Sept. 12, 1997, memo added, "Maybe his family has donated money to Israeli government causes."

The memo also quotes one of Szady's investigators, saying, "From my experience with rich Jewish friends from college, I would fully expect Adam's wealthy daddy to support Israeli political/social causes in some form [such as] Israeli Bonds purchased through the United Jewish Appeal."

A week later, Sept. 19, 1997, before a security polygraph had even been administered, Szady's CEG circulated a secret memo saying that former CIA director "Tenet says this guy is outta here because of lack of candor. Once that's over, it looks like we'll be waving goodbye to our friend."

Szady was third on the distribution list to receive that Sept. 19 memo, according to the routing slip and sources.

A handwritten note on the routing slips comments, "Great job – we should have Ciralsky's report in the security file This will definitely result in termination by cancellation of contract! Thx."

Ciralsky complained to the CIA's inspector general, the Office of Equal Employment Opportunity, to senior administration officials and to Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

After the outlines of the Ciralsky story broke in 1998, the CIA launched an internal and external review of Szady's department, the CEG, to determine whether it had engaged in anti-Semitism.

As a result of that review, Tenet conceded in a letter to Abraham Foxman, the Anti-Defamation League's national director, that "some of the language used by some of the investigators in this case was insensitive, unprofessional and highly inappropriate."

After the review, the CIA hired the Anti-Defamation League to conduct "sensitivity training" within the ranks of Szady's CEG."

Foxman said, "The sensitivity training in the CIA was not directed at one individual. It was directed at a situation. There was a concern in the agency at that time, that the world was changing and the agency itself needed its staff to be sensitive to diversity."

After he left the CIA in 1998, when his contract was not renewed, Ciralsky filed a lawsuit against the CIA, the FBI and others, alleging that he was "unjustly singled out for investigation and subsequently interrogated, harassed, surveilled and terminated from employment with the CIA solely because he is a Jew and he practices the Jewish religion," according to the complaint.

Ciralsky's case was not isolated within the intelligence community, according to senior officials at Jewish organizations who declined to speak for the record. One Jewish official stated that he knew of as many as 10 other CIA employees who had been harassed or pressured because of their Jewish background. The information about the Jewish CIA employees came from postings on the CIA's internal, Jewish-only bulletin board (the agency allows various ethnic groups within its ranks to share company tidbits) and reflects that numerous employees feel anti-Semitism is rampant. One such posting in 2000, obtained from sources, asks, "Does anyone know how one would go about informing the D/CI [director of central intelligence] directly that some incidents of anti-Semitism are tolerated?"

Despite Szady's direct involvement in the Ciralsky case, Szady was decorated twice by the CIA for distinguished service, once with its Seal Medallion and once with the Donovan Award.

Status of AIPAC probe unclear

By MATTHEW E. BERGER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Officials at the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) remain baffled as to why federal investigators have been looking into their work for two years, and why they have not been contacted since the day the case made headlines.

While media reports suggest that a federal grand jury could be empaneled in the case soon, AIPAC defenders say they have heard nothing from prosecutors about a grand jury.

Sources close to the investigation say no AIPAC officials have yet been asked to testify.

The case, which garnered major headlines in the media last month, is believed to focus on a Pentagon official suspected of passing a classified draft policy statement on Iran to AIPAC, the pro-Israel lobby, which allegedly then passed it on to Israel.

AIPAC denies any wrongdoing and has called the alleged charges "baseless."

Jewish communal officials and members of Congress have protested the investigation and have called for an probe into who leaked the investigation and why.

Sources said that after interviews with two AIPAC officials, Steve Rosen and Keith Weissman, at the group's offices were halted on Aug. 27 so that the men could get counsel, no investigators have spoken to either the men, their counsel or other AIPAC officials.

The sources said lawyers have told the investigators that the AIPAC staffers are willing to co-operate.

A search warrant was also executed that day, and the hard drive of Rosen's computer was copied, but the basis for the search warrant remains under seal.

An AIPAC spokesman said the men have returned to the office since that day, but both are currently on vacation.

Rosen has served since the 1980s as the organization's research director, and Weissman is the deputy director for foreign policy issues, specializing in Iran and other Middle East nations.

Larry Franklin, a Pentagon aide suspected of divulging classified information to the AIPAC staffers, is expected to be the initial focus if a grand jury happens.

A spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Eastern District of Virginia, which is handling the case, would not comment on the case. The actions of a grand jury are traditionally secret.

Self exposure

One of my many regrets in life is that I did not learn enough about my forbears. As a youth, when my parents talked about their families, I paid little attention. By the time I got interested, my father had died and my mother could no longer distinguish between myth and reality. Like so many displaced persons, she had mythologized the world she came from.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

I would like my grandchildren to know as much as possible about my wife and myself before we begin to embellish our past beyond recognition. That is why I have just published a memoir, Six Lives. It tells of my years in pre- and postwar Poland, the Soviet Union, Sweden, Britain, Canada and Israel.

My wife Fredzia has written a coda with her perspective on our life together. Our backgrounds are similar, though while I was in the Soviet Union during World War II, she survived in the Lodz ghetto and the Ravensbruck concentration camp. We have known each other since we were teenagers in Sweden.

The writing has been a wholesome exercise. The publication, on the other hand, has been more complex. To make others read about yourself, you lose much of your reserve. Though I have lots of it to lose (to which members of the congregations I served are eager to testify), it is still embarrassing and awkward.

I have heard it said that people who write memoirs have much to hide. Discerning readers no doubt know how to uncover the secrets. But those who read my book will be disappointed in this respect. Yet I hope they will find it interesting.

It is not written as a testament, ethical or otherwise, but as testimony that hardships need not automatically drive you meshuge. Compared to some people we know who had very normal childhoods, we may even be less mixed up and neurotic than they are.

So what has kept us sane? First, our parents also survived. At our wedding in Stockholm, the four of them stood under the chupah, something unique for Polish Jews of our generation. Though my parents were in a Soviet prison for a while and my wife was separated from her father in the camp, the families were together most of the time.

Second, though we were uncertain as to why we survived and others did not, we knew that we wanted to give purpose to our good fortune. Hence our affirmation of the faith, people and ways of Israel. Living as a rabbinic family has given us the unique privilege to live out many of our ideals. This has kept me on an even keel – or as even as is possible for a rabbi.

Hillel reaches out at SFU

This September, more than ever before it seems, Jewish students entering their first year of university at Simon Fraser University (SFU) are seeking out all that Hillel Vancouver, the Foundation for Jewish Campus Life, has to offer.

During campus orientation week for new students, orientation leaders fielded questions about Hillel. As the contact person for the Jewish Students Association, I have received e-mails from several students wondering where and when Hillel meets and what we do.

Jessica Apter in Vancouver

I always tell students interested in social action about the annual Peanut Butter and Jam-A-Thon held here, during which the JSA enlists the help of local businesses, as well as students, faculty and staff on campus, to make sandwiches for Vancouver's homeless population. Or about the Hillel Rosh Chodesh group that teaches women looking for employment how best to prepare for job interviews.

When someone is passionate about Israel, I tell him or her about the Israeli DJs we bring in for parties and about the variety of speakers and events we host during our annual Israel Week. Hillel also offers access to several opportunities for students to travel to Israel at low costs on trips such as Birthright Israel and the Hasbara Fellowships

When both Jewish and non-Jewish students approach us because they want to learn more about the Jewish religion and culture, we invite them to participate in Judaism 101 or our student-led Hebrew classes.

Starting this year, Vancouver Hillel will expand to include Opening Doors, the new club for gay, lesbian, bisexual and "trans" Jewish students in the lower mainland.

I've met friends in residence through Hillel with whom I can celebrate Shabbat and attend synagogue services. And when it comes to Jewish food, the closest we get around here is JSA bagel lunches and Shabbat dinners.

But something is missing. Despite all the hard work and expertise of Vancouver Hillel staff out of the University of British Columbia, the dedication of the board of directors of Hillel and the passion of the students involved, we all hit the same wall over and over again. Hillel at SFU has no home.

National Jewish Campus Life, an organization that works with and provides resources to Jewish campus groups across the country, estimates that there are at least 600 Jewish students at SFU. But without a Hillel House here, we will never meet the vast majority of them.

> Group lacks permanent home

At UBC, Hillel House is a home away from home for a large number of students who walk through its doors between classes every day to use the computers, prepare and eat lunch in its kosher kitchen, play Super Nintendo, chat, nap and most of all, fulfil Hillel's mandate of increasing the number of "Jews doing Jewish with other Jews."

Its welcoming atmosphere can include us as well. But UBC Hillel House is an hour and a half from SFU.

That means that when I meet a Jewish student in one of my classes, I can't invite him or her back to Hillel to meet the other students. The JSA can't hold weekly bagel lunches, because there is a limited number of room bookings available for campus clubs. It means that information tables, pro-Israel exhibits, event sign-up sheets and posters about opportunities for travel to Israel must be transported from across the city, and then put together and taken down each day.

For Israel activists, not having a Hillel space means arranging for three types of security to protect guest speakers. Last year when the Israeli consul general was invited to SFU, anti-Israel protesters were able to violate his right to speak by chanting, in order to drown him out, to the point where there was nearly a riot. Jewish students need a safe place to explore Israel and all aspects of our Judaism freely and without opposition from other voices on campus.

The current building projects at the university allow for the possibility that there will be a permanent home for Hillel on Burnaby Mountain in the near future, and when that commitment is made, Jewish students will undoubtedly stop in to say hello and they will stay.

Whoa! What's the rush?

As my friends and I come to grips with the reality that we are entering our fourth and final year of undergraduate life, our shock and disbelief brings with it the realization that we must soon confront the inevitable question: what next?

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

In the past, the end of university often signified the beginning of real life – the time to get a job or a professional education that would bring with it a specific future – but this simple progression hardly seems to hold anymore. At the age of 21, contemplating the future doesn't seem like something I want to, let alone should, do.

After four years of university, I feel as ill-prepared for the real world as I did at the end of four years of high school. Every time I sit down to write my personal statements that explain my aspirations for a career in law, I realize this goal is little more than an idea. I can't foresee where I will be after three more years of school – right now, it's hard enough to decide whether law school is even right for me, never mind which universities I should apply to.

Even among my good friends, a self-described group of type-A personalities, the once well-lit signs on our chosen paths are no longer so bright. While we used to have clear visions of what we wanted from our academic and professional lives, now that it's time to finally put our plans into action, the end goal no longer seems so obvious. It's one thing to consider a future and another thing altogether to take definite steps to make it happen.

Of course, this hasn't stopped me from proceeding with multiple law school applications. It just means that every day, doubt creeps into my head.

I am fairly certain that the days of a career-for-life have passed. As so many people have told me, law school can offer a gateway to careers other than law. While this line of reasoning helps to soften the "Am I really signing up for a life when I fill out these applications?" fear, it doesn't solve the underlying problem.

I often feel like a train following a set of tracks as they take me past successive stations. There was high school, university and now (hopefully) law school, but though it all, I wonder where "life" is supposed to fit in. I have had my share of amazing experiences over the past few years, and I have made the most of my summers and my time in Halifax. Yet, I don't feel I have enough experience to be embarking on real life in the real world.

Then again, the thought of taking a year off from school is probably even more terrifying than the thought of an office and full-time job to go with it. And so, even though my friends and I have no idea where we are headed in the long run or what use our many years of education will be, a continuation of student life remains our best option.

I am well aware that the world is hardly clamouring for another lawyer. With my eyes somewhat open to possibilities beyond law, my hope is that the next three years will help me figure out where I really want to be.

I realize that the norm may be to determine what you want and then get the education you need to reach your goal. But being one for creative reasoning, I will argue for the merits of the reverse – through education, you can and will inevitably come to discover where that education is meant to lead you.

I am sure many parents out there will not agree with that sentiment. But the reality is that we have time, and it's better to experience each stage of life than to lose out on the present because we're too focussed on the future.

The Kirshner File

The czarist emancipation of Russian Jews

Jews in czarist Russia were widely seen as a seriously oppressed minority. Memories of Russian Jews fleeing the terror of pogroms and the ache of poverty reinforced the generally accepted view that the Russian Jewish community was the least integrated and emancipated in Europe, and that integration did not really occur until after the tumultuous 1917 Bolshevik Revolution.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Benjamin Nathans, a University of Pennsylvania historian, overturns this recycled theory in Beyond the Pale: The Jewish Encounter with Late Imperial Russia, a fascinating, though stolid book published by the University of California Press.

Having had access to long-closed archives, Nathans concludes that the Russian government instituted a policy of selective integration in the 1860s that enabled some Jews to reap the fruits of social and physical mobility.

The policy, which was implemented in the wake of the so-called "great reforms," had a significant impact.

The largest non-Slavic ethnic group in the Russian empire, Jews were able to gravitate in much greater numbers toward professions such as banking, medicine and journalism. Just as important, they were permitted to live outside the Pale of Settlement, a territorial enclave the size of France consisting of 25 provinces in Poland, Lithuania, Belorussia, Ukraine, Bessarabia and Crimea.

As Nathans suggests, Russia's interest in selective integration was strictly utilitarian and layered with condescension and anti-Semitism.

Russian envoys who had gone on fact-finding missions to Western Europe – such as Czar Nicholas I's minister of state domains, Count Pavel Dmitrievich Kiselev – argued that Russia could benefit from a policy of tolerance and acceptance.

These emissaries called for dismantling Jewish communal autonomy, fostering a modernized rabbinate, freeing Jewish education from the allegedly harmful influence of the Talmud, recasting the Jewish occupational profile and "merging" Jews with the surrounding population.

In the main, Russian rulers who agreed with this prescription for assimilation strongly believed that integration should proceed as gradually as possible. Gradualism was preferable, they claimed, because Jews were supposedly mired in fanatical separatism and hostility toward Christian society.

As Sergei Uvarov, the minister of enlightenment, observed: "Believe me, if we had such Jews as I met in the different capitals of Germany, we would treat them with the utmost distinction, but our Jews are entirely different."

By 1897, when selective integration was already being put into practice, Russia was home to 5.2 million Jews, the fifth largest ethnic group after Russians, Ukrainians, Poles and Belorussians.

Russian Jews were indeed a distinctive minority, possessing their own languages (Yiddish and Hebrew), forms of dress and occupations, and supporting a vast network of religious, educational, legal and charitable institutions.

"These factors, together with the persistence of officially sanctioned legal discrimination, helped preserve Judaism not only as a religion but as a distinct social order," Nathans writes.

By the mid-19th century, virtually every Jew in Russia resided in the Pale of Settlement, which Catherine II had established by decree in 1791 and which comprised five per cent of the land area of the Russian empire.

From the 1870s onward, hundreds of thousand of Jews began settling outside the Pale, where Jews constituted 12 per cent of the population. Many Jews went to St. Petersburg, the capital.

In general, rabbis opposed the migration of Jews from the Pale, fearing it would undermine their authority and weaken the religious observance of the migrants.

In most cases, St. Petersburg was the first truly Russian city Jewish migrants experienced. One such person, the Yiddish writer Peretz Hirshbein, was duly impressed: "For the first time, I felt myself in a Russian atmosphere." For his part, the Bundist Vladimir Medem found St. Petersburg "an amazing city, deep and withdrawn, like the Russian soul."

Nathans says that, within a remarkably short period, St. Petersburg Jews projected a new image of the Jew as modern, cosmopolitan and strikingly successful in quintessential urban professions. No other Jewish community in Russia was as affluent as St. Petersburg, the address of choice of the Jewish plutocracy.

Yet he adds: "This new profile did not supplant but instead coexisted uneasily with the enduring figure of the Russian Jew as backward, fanatically separatist and frequently impoverished."

Not surprisingly, the increasing presence of Jews in St. Petersburg caused a reaction among Russian nativists.

The popular press raised the spectre of a city swamped by Jews from the Pale. One newspaper said that St. Petersburg ought to be "cleansed" of such undesirable elements. Another editorialist suggested the forcible removal of Jews to the Pale.

Be that as it may, the process of acculturation worked. From 1869 to 1910, the declared native language of almost half the Jews in St. Petersburg shifted from Yiddish to Russian. Nathans says this development was associated with a rise in literacy.

In his opinion, the setting in which selective integration achieved its most dramatic success was the university campus.

Prior to the 1860s, the majority of Jews shunned secular education, regarding it as little more than an instrument of forced assimilation and even apostasy. The flow of Jewish students to universities, however, was important, forming the nucleus of a Russian Jewish intelligentsia.

Count Pavel Dmitrievich Kiselev

The backlash was inevitable. Certain conservative circles issued dire warnings that educated Russian Jews would infiltrate and de-Christianize Russian society. In line with this xenophobia, the influential Moskovskie Vedomosti (Moscow News) told its readers that, without admission curbs, Russian universities and the civil service would soon be dominated by Jews.

The arguments against the influx of Jews into universities were four-fold: Jews would deprive Christians of educational opportunities; Jews exercised a negative moral influence on Christians; Jewish students supported the revolutionary movement; Jews would shift the balance of power of technical and professional elites into the hands of a non-Russian, non-Christian minority, whose loyalty to the monarchy was doubtful.

As a result of renewed student unrest in the 1880s, the government imposed a formal numerus clausus on Jewish university students. The quota system, while intensifying the Jewish drive to excel, dealt a major blow to the ideal of the university as a melting pot.

Quotas severely curtailed Jewish enrolment, but hardly closed the door to universities and technical institutes. Nathans discloses that just under eight per cent of the total male student body in 1913 was Jewish.

Certainly, selective integration produced a torrent of Jewish law graduates.

During the 1880s, Jews accounted for 26 per cent of lawyers in Warsaw, 49 per cent in Odessa and 21 percent in St. Petersburg.

In this respect, Nathans notes, Russia's judiciary was more open to Jews in the late 19th century than the Austrian empire and Britain.

Surveying selective integration in its entirety, he comes to the conclusion that it was "a highly uneven experiment."

The entry of Jews into universities and the professions was a singular success. But the spectre of Jewish participation in left-wing revolutionary movements prompted the government to lose confidence in this policy.
